[Text] The secretary general of the Turkish Foreign Ministry, Mr Turkmen, flew back to Ankara today after talks in Nicosia with the government of the federated state. In a statement at Ercan State Airport, Mr Turkmen said that in his talks with President Denktas and other Turkish Cypriot officials he had been briefed on the line to be adopted by the federated state at the forthcoming intercommunal negotiations and stressed that both the Turkish Government and the federated state sincerely hoped that the intercommunal talks would be successfully concluded and that they would constitute a stage for the settlement of the Cyprus problem.

In reply to a question Mr Turkmen said that Turkey had not adopted a detailed policy on the intercommunal talks and that the responsibility lay with the Turkish Cypriot community at the negotiations. But the Turkish Government wanted a settlement which would safeguard the rights of the Turkish Cypriots and which would enable them to live in peace and security. A settlement, he added, was important not only for Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot community but also for the region.

Referring to the Denktas-Makarios guidelines, Mr Turkmen said that a solution based on these principles would be sought at the talks.

On the question of Varosha, Mr Turkmen said they had not discussed the issue in detail but he understood that the Turkish Cypriot side had been making some preparations in connection with the problem. However, he added, the views of the opposite side should also be taken before the final assessment of the situation. He drew attention to the fact that Varosha was not the only question to be discussed at the talks. Four points were on the agenda and Varosha was only one of them.

Mr Turkmen stated that the problems of the Turkish Cypriot community had also been discussed at his talks at Nicosia. He said it was essential that the community should be self-sufficient and have self-confidence. Now the problem that needed a solution was air transport and he stressed that he would take up all the problems concerning the community with the ministries concerned on his return to Ankara.

ERBAKAN EXPRESSES READINESS TO FORM MINORITY GOVERNMENT

TA091827 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 9 Sep 80

[Text] In a news conference in London, NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan announced that his party is ready to establish a minority government by itself.

According to the TRT London correspondent, in his news conference, Erbakan criticized the government and the RPP and said: We propose to form a government by ourselves. What harm would it do if the nation gives our party the chance to form a government? Erbakan continued: We did not want the government to be toppled before preparing a list of future government members. However, the RPP insisted on first toppling the government and then finding a solution. Until the last moment we waited for a change in this attitude but there was no change. It was asked: Will Erbakan become the prime minister? The matter does not concern the office of the prime minister. When we failed to obtain any result, we acted in a manner you already know. Erbakan also noted that it is too late in the year to hold early elections.

ECEVIT CALLS ON WORKERS TO ACTIVELY PARTICIPATE IN POLITICS

[Excerpts] The 17th Congress of the Turkish Petroleum, Chemical, Nitrogen and Atomic Workers Union [Petrol-Is] affiliated with the Turkish Confederation of Labor [Turk-Is] began in Istanbul today. Speaking at the congress, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit called on all Turkish workers loyal to democracy to participate more actively in the political process within the framework of the healthy principles of democracy. Ecevit compared Turkey's political arena to a match. He said political parties and politicians were in the field while a majority of the society remained as spectators. Noting that a boring, irritating and quarrelsome game was going on in the field and that the spectators were at times irritated even with their own teams, Ecevit noted that the workers were mostly spectators.

Referring to recent developments in Poland, Ecevit said the regime has begun to change as a result of the workers' attitude and that no one could prevent this change. Ecevit said: What I expect from Turkish workers is not an action similar to the one Polish workers were forced to take because there is not need for such action in Turkey. The rights for which Polish workers are struggling have already been granted to Turkish workers through legal channels. Noting that there are attempts in Turkey to transform the collective agreement system and unionism into a collective wage system, Ecevit said the result of such developments will destroy unionism and will abolish the right to strike.

Expressing the view that the government is openly defying the workers, Ecevit continued: The prime minister is defying the workers by claiming that there are 3.5 million unemployed in the country. In other words, he wishes to say "you have no right to defend workers rights while there are 3.5 million unemployed." Are the workers responsible for the current unemployment figure? Or is the person who has been prime minister 10 years out of the last 15, his governments and his policies responsible for the unemployment?

FRG DEFENSE MINISTER OPENS 'AUTUMN FORGE' MANEUVERS

LD081230 Hamburg DPA in German 1106 GMT 8 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Guetersloh--"We are dependent on one another for support. Our joint defense capability is the basis on which the Western allies develop their policy of detente, the need for which has become even more evident as a result of the events in Afghanistan and Poland. Our policy serves to prevent war." This was how Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel today opened the large-scale NATO military maneuvers on German territory at the British military airfield in Guetersloh. These maneuvers are beginning at the same time as the Warsaw Pact maneuvers.

FRG General's Comments

DW101129 Cologne DEUTSCHLANDFUNK Network in German to East and West Germany 0518 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Excerpts from correspondent Peters' interview with Gen Lothar Domroese, deputy chief of staff for planning and operations--date, place of interview not given; recorded]

[Text] [Question] Such large-scale military exercises have become so costly that an important link in the NATO chain is missing this time. The Belgians have canceled their participation for financial reasons. How is it possible under these circumstances to realistically conduct a concerted exercise? Is it possible at all?

[Answer] What is important is that we stick together in this alliance to protect our way of life. It would be a bad sign for us if we could not handle problems such as those of the Belgians.

[Question] Does this not constitute a dangerous gap in the so-called forward defense? It is necessary to state quite frankly that we cannot expect too much of the Dutch, the Danes, the Norwegians, or the Italians and the partners on the southern flank in these fall maneuvers.

[Answer] To begin with it would be very bad if I, as the planning and operations chief, were to give Europe the impression that the noncompliance with expected performance does not entail difficulties and that this is not a negative example and sign. The nations must consider how to cope with their financial difficulties and how they can, on the other hand, provide the indispensable measure of common defense and deterrence today and tomorrow. Now, you asked: Is this not a dangerous gap in forward defense? Surely you will agree with me that nonparticipation in military exercises hopefully will not yet show any effect on the readiness and will concerning performance in forward defense. In addition I am not ignoring the great concern, in particular on my part, that decreasing defense budget expenditures in individual states will entail a decrease in defense performance sooner or later. This is particularly harmful and alarmingif we cannot but observe at the same time that the Soviet Union, for example, has an extraordinary new ship design, the product of which has been making test cruises in the Baltic Sea for weeks already, the Kirov, a kind of ship which so far we have not observed on the Soviet side. It no doubt constitutes a step ahead for the Soviets, but is against the backdrop of a considerably lower standard of living for the citizens of the Soviet Union.

[Question] What do you think of the division of labor among NATO partners?

[Answer] This idea which was outlined by Graf Baudissin is certainly worth consideration. A ray of hope is that we have achieved agreement this spring at the session of the defense ministers, so that NATO headquarters now has planning authority and a planning mission reaching 15 to 20 years into the future. We have to make considerations and present them anually to the ministers regarding the demands and projects we have vis-a-vis individual nations and their contributions to defense.

KREISKY LECTURE ON MIDEAST, AFGHANISTAN, IRAN, POLAND

AU101351 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 10 Sep 80 p 5

[SK report: "Kreisky: Middle East Peace Only Through New Government"]

[Summary] In a lecture in the framework of the Vienna International University courses, Chancellor Bruno Kreisky said on Monday evening that there could be a possibility of overcoming the differences between Israel and the Palestinians regarding the establishment of a Palestinian state if, as is likely in a year's time, other politicians are in power in Israel. "However, one would at long last have to sit down at a conference table and discuss the numerous detailed problems involved, such as the question of the 80,000 jobs of Palestinians in Israel or the question of goods and passenger traffic, Kreisky said. He stressed that a solution of the problem is possible if it is genuinely sought, but peace in this region is also a question of Israel's domestic policy."

Regarding the Afghanistan problem Kreisky stated that in the past few years the United States has not shown much interest in the events in that country. As long as it believed to be sure of Iran, it let the other pursue its interests in Afghanistan. Only after the revolution in Iran did this region become problematic for the United States. The Afghanistan problem is rather complicated, because who can tell who is entitled to speak on behalf of the Afghan people: the regime in Kabul, or the people who are living in camps outside the country? Thus a solution must be found that comprises more than just the country of Afghanistan, and the Soviet Union must realize that its "enemies" do not want to establish strongholds on its borders. There should be an easing of tensions through mutual concessions, which would in turn permit a partial withdrawal and a pacification of the Afghan population.

Regarding Iran, Kreisky said a development was underway that was still far from coming to an end. Undoubtedly Bani Sadr is a man who is fully aware of the current problems including that surrounding the U.S. hostages. "However, in Iran there are also politicians who do not at all want the opening toward the West that would be linked with a solution of the hostage problem. They rather favor isolation, so as to be able to serve the pure doctrine." One should not give the Islamic people the impression that they are isolated, but rather the Iranians should not insult the American people as they are doing by holding hostages.

"If the agreements between the Polish leadership and the workers are actually kept, it would be a great thing, Kreisky continued, adding that in this issue the Soviet Union had also acted in a different way from what had been widely expected. This is primarily due to the spirit of Helsinki. Thus, if one wants to judge detente, one should not only look upon Afghanistan but must also take Poland into consideration.

"Austria will, at any rate, offer its good offices for peace whenever this is desired by both sides, Kreisky declared."

BONN SEES NO PROSPECT OF EARLY SCHMIDT-KANIA MEETING

LD101352 Hamburg DPA in German 1321 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Test] Bonn, 10 Sep (DPA)--For the moment no meeting is in prospect between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and the new Polish party leader, Stanislaw Kania. Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald said in Bonn today that it is certain that German-Polish contacts in this direction will be continued at an appropriate time. A meeting between Schmidt and Kania, however, is not exactly "at the top of the agenda" from the Polish viewpoint. Kania's predecessor, Edward Gierek, intended to visit the chancellor in Hamburg in August but the meeting was called off 24 hours before it was due to start because of the crisis in Poland. According to Gruenewald, the Federal Government has the impression that Poland will continue to follow its foreign policy line to date. There are no indications of change. The government spokesman stressed in this respect Poland's positive and constructive role in the process of detente and disarmament.

CDU'S KOHL REBUTS POLISH ALLEGATION OF INTERFERENCE

LD101230 Hamburg DPA in German 1050 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Goettingen, (DPA)--CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl has described as "absolute nonsense" the accusation by Polish newspapers that in its election campaign the CDU/CSU is trying to make "political capital" out of the events in Poland. In an interview with GOETTINGER TAGEBLATT, an edited version of which was prereleased to DPA, Kohl drew attention to the remarks made by Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky, who has repeatedly stressed that his place as a Socialist was by the side of the striking Polish workers. The union is not interfering in Poland's internal affairs, said Kohl. The events there were no subject for an election campaign. The policy of detente does not mean, however, that one's sympathy and word as a free citizen in a free country has to be suppressed.

ECONOMICS MINISTRY SECRETARY ON CREDIT GUARANTEES TO POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 10 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Economics Ministry estimates that Poland will begin in 1985 to repay the DM400 million credit which has been guaranteed by the Federal Government with additional deliveries of coal to the Federal Republic. Replying to a parliamentary question, State Secretary Dieter von Wuerzen of the Federal Economics Ministry pointed out today that the government guarantee of credit is intended for the opening up of Polish coal deposits in the neighborhood of Lublin-Chelm near Poland's eastern border. The Polish Government has declared its readiness to deliver 800,000 tons of coal annually during the 1985-1989 period. In addition Warsaw has also promised to maintain the traditional coal deliveries to the Federal Republic. Negotiations between the Polish side and German firms interested in Polish coal are about to be concluded.

According to the state secretary, other Western countries--the last was Austria--granted substantially increased credits to Poland. Von Wuerzen said that the Federal Government did not, as a matter of principle, attach political conditions for the borrower in the case of raw material projects since such guarantees are in the German economic interest. As for the DM800 million credit by a consortium of German banks, he said that it is not up to the Federal Government to attach conditions to credits granted by banks on their own commercial responsibility. The Federal Government proceeds from the premise that the Polish side, which according to the banks had always repaid earlier credits on time, would not change its behavior in the future. The rest of the outside world also has confidence in Poland's ability to honor its commitments. Only a few days ago a consortium of Anglo-U.S. banks had promised, together with the Soviet bank, substantial credit to Poland.

DELEGATION OF GERMAN BISHOPS TO VISIT POLAND

LD100922 Hamburg DPA in German 0832 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Bonn, 10 Sep (DPA)--A delegation of the German bishops' conference is going on an official visit to Poland on Thursday. The trip, which was agreed some time ago, is a return visit for the official Polish bishops' conference visit to the Federal Republic in 1978. The German delegation is headed by the chairman of the bishops' conference, Cardinal Joseph Hoeffner. The first meeting will be held at the Polish shrine at Czestochowa, where the German bishops will be officially welcomed on Thursday evening by the Polish Episcopate.

HUNGARIAN FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR 3-DAY VISIT

[Text] Bonn, (DPA)--Hungarian Foreign Minister Frigyes Puja arrived in Bonn today for a 3-day official visit. His first meeting was with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Tomorrow Puma will be received by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Federal President Karl Carstens.

The main topics the Hungarian foreign minister is to discuss in Bonn are the continuation of the policy of detente with a view to the Madrid followup meeting of the European security conference; the arms limitation efforts and international tension hotbeds, including Poland, Afghanistan and the Middle East. Economic cooperation between Hungary and the Federal Republic will also be discussed.

Meets With Genscher

[Text] Bonn, 10 Sep (DPA)--Hopes of positive results from the Madrid CSCE followup meeting for the process of detente in Europe, arms limitation problems, and the development of economic cooperation between the Federal Republic and Hungary were the main topics of an exchange of views held between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and his Hungarian counterpart, Frigyes Puja, in Bonn today. During his 3-day official visit Puja will be received tomorrow by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Federal President Karl Carstens.

Bonn is expecting the talks with the Hungarian foreign minister to result in fresh incentives for a East-West dialogue. The good development of relations between the Federal Republic and Hungary is regarded by diplomatic circles as an excellent example of how countries with different social systems can maintain good, problem-free relations. Puja is the first Eastern bloc foreign minister to come to Bonn as an official guest since the beginning of the Polish crisis. He was originally scheduled to come to the Federal Republic at the beginning of the year but the date was postponed due to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The consequences of this invasion of Afghanistan, the Polish situation and Middle East conflict will play an important part in the international exchange of views between the Federal Government and Puja.

Proposing a toast at a dinner tonight Genscher said he hoped that the Madrid followup conference on European security will provide important new impulses for the policy of detente. However, this calls for great political efforts from all sides.

According to the federal foreign minister, security and confidence in Europe could be substantially increased if new, militarily significant, verifiable confidence-building measures binding on everybody could be worked out. But confidence-building can be fully effective only if it embraces the entire European continent. "In this spirit we support the French proposal that the followup conference should formulate a precisely defined mandate for a conference on disarmament in Europe devoted to confidence-building measures."

Genscher recalled the offer of the North Atlantic defensive alliance to enter into negotiations on the limitation and reduction of medium-range weapons as soon as possible. In this context he attached great importance to the forthcoming talks on this subject in New York between U.S. Secretary of State Muskie and his Soviet opposite number, Gromyko.

In an official statement by the Foreign Ministry, Foreign Minister Genscher paid tribute to the visit of his Hungarian opposite number as an expression of the readiness of both governments to continue the dialogue between East and West. In the same context he drew attention to the importance of the relationship between the two Germanies for developments in Europe.

The two sides welcomed the forthcoming meeting of Foreign Ministers Muskie and Gromyko. Genscher emphasized the Federal Government's desire for constructive cooperation at the CSCE followup conference.

Supports Afghanistan Invasion

[Text] Bonn, 10 Sep (DPA)--Hungarian Foreign Minister Frigyes Puja has come out in favor of the convening of a European disarmament conference. Speaking at a dinner given in Bonn this evening by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Puja said that Hungary expects from the CSCE followup conference in Madrid that by the "exclusion of propagandistic elements," a contribution can be made to the strengthening of security and cooperation in Europe and to the promotion of disarmament

In clear contrast to the official attitude of the Federal Government, Puja supported the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Departing from the prepared manuscript of his speech the Hungarian foreign minister expressly defended Moscow's intervention in favor of the "legitimate government" in Kabul. In addition, Puja called for negotiations on the medium-range nuclear missiles stationed in Europe, including the "forward based American nuclear weapons." He thereby allied himself with the recent proposals of Soviet party and state leader Leonid Brezhnev.

U.S. AIDE MEETS W. BERLIN MAYOR, GDR MINISTER

[Excerpts] Berlin 10 Sep (DPA)--Raymond C. Ewing, assistant secretary in the U.S. State Department, had political talks in both parts of Berlin today. In East Berlin he met GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer and in West Berlin Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe. A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in East Berlin called the meeting with Fischer a routine talk but declined to give any further details.

In West Berlin Ewing met Stobbe for an exchange of views on the political situation in the city. According to the Senat press office the 60-minute talk at Schloss Charlottenburg dwelt on the Quadripartite Agreement and the state of inter-German relations. Stobbe and Ewing were agreed that the Quadripartite Agreement and the practical regulations were "functioning consistently." It was also noted with satisfaction, the statement says, that despite the strain to which the East-West dialogue had been exposed of late, Berlin provided a successful example of detente policy.

GENSCHER OPENS FRG-ZAIRE ECONOMIC COMMISSION

[Text] Bonn, (DPA)--The Federal Republic and Zaire intend to further increase their cooperation, particularly in the economic field. At the opening of the seventh session of the German-Zaire commission in Bonn today, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher stressed that the Federal Government is prepared to look for additional possibilities in this field.

Genscher also said that the mixed commission in the past had set in motion a number of economic and development cooperation projects which were helping to strengthen economic and social conditions in Zaire. This reflects the Federal Republic's foreign policy toward Third World countries which is aimed at equal and partnerlike cooperation.

Zairian Foreign Minister Inonga Lokonga Lome thanked Genscher for the interest the Federal Government has always shown in Zaire's development. His country feels itself closely linked politically and economically to the Federal Republic.

Before the commission's meeting, the two foreign ministers had a political exchange of views which centered mainly on the situation in southern Africa.

EX-U.S. EMBASSY EMPLOYEE ARRESTED AS SPY

LD091550 Hamburg DPA in German 1510 GMT 9 Sep 80

[Summary] Karlsruhe, 9 Sep (DPA)--The Karlsruhe federal prosecutor's office confirmed today a report in BILD-ZEITUNG that a 48-year old Polish citizen was arrested several weeks ago in the Federal Republic on suspicion of espionage work for an Eastern intelligence service.

The arrest warrant against him was issued 9 August. Since 1975 he had been employed as an accountant in the finance department of the U.S. Embassy in Bonn.

The federal prosecutor's office and the U.S. Embassy in Bonn gave the name of the arrested man as Henryk Dimski. According to the Karlsruhe authorities he is "not of outstanding importance." He is said to have spied on behalf of the Polish intelligence service on data available to him as part of his work. An embassy spokesman said that his employment with the embassy was terminated on 15 August 1980 by mutual consent.

Dimski is also charged with having spied on security installations and reporting on embassy equipment and on persons employed there. During the period when he was engaged in espionage work he had a number of meetings in the Federal Republic and in Poland with his "control."

COLOMBO ANSWERS QUESTIONS ON POLAND, OTHER COUNTRIES

[Text] Rome, 10 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo today voiced hopes that developments in Poland in the aftermath of the settlement reached between striking workers and the Warsaw government can be shielded from outside interference in response to parliamentary queries filed on a number of current international issues. In his statement to the lower house, the foreign minister applauded the labor-government agreement in Poland and identified it as a "realistic compromise", the product of a "high sense of responsibility and moderation". What really counts today, Colombo continued, is the widest and most concrete implementation possible of the understanding. Therefore, the Italian Government is closely following the changes taking place in the leadership of Poland and is concerned lest these changes lead to backsliding as regards the agreements.

The diplomatic chief disclosed that the Italian Government, like the other European governments, is maintaining a scrupulous reserve, "imposed by respect for the sovereign sphere of another state and by the international factors at play". This stance is also dictated by the "priority concern to spare the Polish people harsh and bitter experiences" according to the foreign minister who added, "if the causes of events in Poland have been internal, their solutions can only be internal".

Colombo chose not to pass judgment on Polish policy "because", he said, "it is not up to the Italian Government to formulate such judgment". The foreign minister did note, however, that the demands of the Polish workers, beyond the economic considerations, disclosed "structural insufficiencies of the system in relation to the maturity of a society like that of the Poles".

The cabinet official also spoke of the lack of mediation mechanisms and shortcomings on the social front in Poland which led to the absence of those political areas which are necessary components for the development of any national society and each individual. Colombo then carefully distinguished the point that reserve is one thing and indifference is quite another before underscoring Italy's willingness to do what is necessary, within the limits of its capabilities, to help Poland in the form of concrete economic and financial cooperation.

Moving on to conditions in Bolivia and El Salvador, the foreign minister affirmed that "no position of indulgence is permissible as regards military solutions" to the problems in these Latin American countries. To hammer home the point, Colombo said that not only are these positions "inadmissible they are also certain to fail to bring about an appropriate settlement".

The head of Italy's diplomacy once again "condemned without reservations" the human rights violations registered in these two countries and gave assurances that the Rome government intends to bend efforts, along with all democratic countries to put a halt to these violations. These intentions, he said, extend to reopening the process of democratization interrupted by the military coup in Bolivia and to contributing to the urgent reconciliation required in El Salvador to put this country back on the path toward a free and democratic life.

Colombo also reported that Italy did not follow the lead of the other European Community countries and is instead not transferring embassy personnel from San Salvador because of the institutional duties conducted by the staff to safeguard the interests of the Italian community in El Salvador.

UCD EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE SUPPORTS NEW GOVERNMENT

LD082222 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 8 Sep 80

[Reporter's dispatch from Moncloa Palace]

[Text] We are now able to offer you the official note from the meeting of the Union of Democratic Center [UCD] Executive Committee. Its text is as follows:

The UCD Executive Committee met at 1900 this evening under the chairmanship of Adolfo Suarez, and with the attendance of all its members except for Mr Alzaga Villaamil who had sent apologies in advance, as he is traveling abroad. During the meeting the prime minister delivered a lengthy report on the lines of action the new cabinet will be pursuing, the talks which have been held with other political parties, and the composition of the new government. The Executive Committee supports the new government and at the same time puts on record its approval of the government's political statement which will be presented in parliament at the appropriate time. Such is the brief text of the note.

Suarez Comments

[Excerpts] Adolfo Suarez has held long discussions with Martin Villa and Fernandez Ordonez. He later spoke to journalists. Suarez said that the new government will last until 1983 and that he is satisfied, though he still has worries. The crisis, he said, has been resolved. In his view the new cabinet will be capable of confronting, with toughness and efficiency, the problems facing society.

Questioned about connections between the resolving of the crisis and the forthcoming congress of the centrist party, Suarez replied that the UCD Congress has nothing to do with the government. The centrist congress, Suarez said, will focus on the discussion of internal party matters and adapting the party program to the changes taking place in Spanish society. Adolfo Suarez was unwilling to comment on the question of parliamentary pacts. As he put it, the new government was created with the intention of being a stable one, and he hopes that that is what it will be.

GOVERNMENT TO SUBMIT PROGRAM FOR VOTE OF CONFIDENCE

LD102339 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Rafael Arias Salgado, minister in the prime minister's office, a highly authorized spokesman, said today at the inauguration ceremony of the National Exhibition of Castille and Leon [in Valladolid] that the government will submit its program to a vote of confidence at the next plenary session of the Congress of Deputies [on 16 September]. The new government, Arias Salgado stated at the inauguration of this exhibition, was formed to confront the crisis, and this can be seen from its composition, by its parliamentary backing and its capacity to inspire confidence. For Arias Salgado the concept of confidence is more important in Spain than in any other country.

ADDITIONAL CARRILLO REMARKS ON OPPOSITION TO GOVERNMENT

[Text] The PCE has said, through its Secretary General Santiago Carrillo, that it will adopt a stance of radical opposition to the new Suarez government, and that to this end they will try to conclude joint agreements with the PSOE [Spanish Socialist Workers Party] and other leftwing forces and also to carry out a campaign of popular mobilization.

The Communist leader said parliament's work is blocked and this hinders the solution of the country's serious problems. Without social pressure, says Carrillo, we shall find ourselves faced with preterm elections, which will solve nothing but rather will make Spain ungovernable.

The left, in Carrillo's view, has lost the political initiative it won in the recent censure motion proposed by the Socialists against Prime Minister Suarez, and he added that the opposition must seek to recover this initiative.

The PCE secretary general called upon the government to tackle resolutely the problem of unemployment and the questions of agrarian reform and the economic crisis. But the chances of success for this new government, says Carrillo, are not very high.

OREJA PRESENTS GOVERNMENT WHITE PAPER ON CSCE

LD100953 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 5 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] Madrid, 4 September--Early this afternoon Foreigh Minister Marcelino Oreja presented to journalists the government white paper on the CSCE conference, which is due to meet in Madrid this fall and whose inaugural session takes place on 9 September. The white paper includes a report on Spain's implementation of the final act signed on 1 August 1975 at the CSCE Conference in Helsinki. The minister said that the white paper centers mainly on the issue of human rights and freedoms, and also on the environment, tourism and emigration.

Spain's delegate to the security conference, Javier Ruperez, then gave a press conference during which he said that the security measures drawn up for the normal running of the conference are excellent.

Asked whether there have been any ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] threats against the European conference, Ruperez said that there have not, adding that "security measures embrace both the conference building itself and the adjacent areas." With regard to proposals concerning terrorism, Ruperez said: "In Belgrade there were some proposals regarding terrorism but they did not prosper. I hope that some kind of resolution on the subject will be approved here in Madrid."

Other topics discussed by Ruperez at the press conference were as follows:

The atmosphere preceding the conference: Preparations for the conference are difficult but the situation has improved, because it was necessary. A certain rapprochement of stances can be observed. All the participants believe that there will be a thorough review of implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. Nevertheless, I must specify that this is only part, not all of the conference. The preparatory phase will be procedural, with a partly political background.

Afghanistan-USSR: No country can impose conditions on another country regarding the topics to be discussed. If the Afghan invasion is not discussed at the preparatory stage it is because this phase is concerned with organization and procedure. But it does not mean that Afghanistan will not be discussed. Spain will not act as a mediator on any topic. In recent months there has been no contact between the Soviet Union and the United States either on this or any other topic. We consider it necessary to sound out every opinion.

Polemical points: The controversial points in the first phase of the conference will include how much time to allocate to reviewing implementation of the Helsinki Final Act and the work schedule (Spain wants the plan to be the "yellow paper" adopted in Belgrade).

Spain, a Western country: Spain will act at the conference as a Western country and will have intensive contacts with the EEC countries and also with other participants. Spain's stance on Afghanistan as far as the conference is concerned is not to enter into any polemics, but neither to forget situations that have considerably worsened the international situation. Spain's position is now very different from when the Helsinki Final Act was signed (1975), since the definition of our foreign policy is much clearer now.

Inauguration by the king: He did not rule out the possibility of King Juan Carlos opening the Security Conference.

Poland: The situation in Poland is a purely domestic, that is, a Polish, matter. It has not gone beyond that and there is no reason why it should affect the conference's resolutions.

NATO and Spain: I do not see that the possibility of Spain's joining NATO could affect Spain's quality as host country, because the conference acknowledges every member country's right to belong to any organization. We want the conference to be a success and will work toward its producing balanced results in the final act. We do not feel responsible for the success or failure of the conference. The conference could necessitate a quest for compromises.

U.S. election: I do not believe that the U.S. election will affect the course of the conference, since the latter begins on 11 November and the election is on 4 November; but a change in the U.S. administration, in the event of a substantially different vote, would not take place until 20 January 1981, which would leave more than enough time to complete the CSCE preparatory phase.

Detente: We consider it important that the subject of detente be discussed and that the meaning of the concept be well specified. Detente must mean the same in both Eastern bloc and Western countries and must be real, indivisible and clear cut.

SWEDEN

NEGOTIATIONS UNDERTAKEN ON SOVIET NATURAL GAS DEAL

LD080753 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 2 Sep 80 p 28

[Hans Hallgren report: "New Negotiations on Russian Natural Gas"]

[Text] Sweden has now resumed talks with the Soviet Union on importing natural gas.

The Soviet Union is offering a number of West European nations, including Sweden, the chance to purchase 40 billion cubic meters of natural gas per year for 20 years. First commercial contacts have been made between the Swedish gas company Swedegas and the Soviet gas authority. A new meeting is planned for October, and Sweden will specify its wishes in terms of quantities and delivery schedules for this meeting. With this the protracted negotiations form the first half of the 1970's on the import of large quantities of Soviet natural gas to Sweden will be resumed. Negotiations at that time led nowhere, since it turned out that the Soviet Union needed the bulk of its natural gas for its own use. Since then the Soviet Union has made great natural gas finds in northwest Siberia.

After a Soviet Government decision these finds have been offered for export sales. One of the reasons for the export offer is assumed to be the need for foreign currency. The offer to Sweden to buy Soviet gas was made by First Deputy Foreign Trade Minister Yuri Brezhnev at a meeting with Industry Minister Nils G. Aasling at the end of June this year. "The Soviet offer is interesting and we will look into the delivery situation," Nile Aasling told DAGENS NYHETER in June. "It will still be a while before real negotiations can begin, but the October meeting will take us a little way along the road," Swedegas Managing Director Claes Lindgren said.

The Soviet Union has also contacted France, West Germany, Italy and Austria. The Soviet Union has already sold pipeline gas to West Germany in the past.

The new large find in northwest Siberia would need approximately 5,500 km of pipeline, and the Russians want part of the gas to be paid for in pipeline supplied from the West.

The last time Sweden negotiated with the Soviet Union on gas it was intended that the gas would be transported by pipeline via Finland over the Aaland Sea to the Swedish Coast. As yet there are no detailed plans of how possible supplies would be arranged this time.

KIPRIANOU ADDRESSES NEW CABINET AFTER SWEARING-IN CEREMONY

NC101303 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 10 Sep 80

The president of the republic also called on the ministers to devote themselves to their task and assist him to the greatest degree possible in the efforts he is exerting to solve the national question, particularly at this difficult time the country is passing through. He went on: Our target is a virtuous administration; we must serve the people and the national cause. In conclusion, President Kiprianou expressed the conviction that the members of the new Council of Ministers would prove worthy of the people's and his personal expectations.

Government Spokesman's Comments

[Text] The government spokesman has stated that certain comments in the press to the effect that the new government is weaker than the previous one are unsubstantiated. It is right and just, he added, that the new government should be left undistracted to work for the country and then later be evaluated on the basis of its work.

In answer to a question the spokesman stated that from the time of his appointment as the Greek side's representative to the intercommunal talks in May 1979, Mr Yeoryios Oannidhis had substantially withdrawn from the post of minister to the president, and his duties were exercised by another minister. Therefore, the spokesman said, it was natural for the ministry to the president, which was vacant, to be filled in the government reshuffle by appointing a new minister.

ROLANDHIS: CYPRUS MAY 'TURN ELSEWHERE' IF EEC TALKS FAIL

NC101000 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 8 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] If the Cypriot-EEC association agreement is not completed, our agricultural production growth will be curtailed and Cyprus will face frightful economic problems. This was reported to us by well-informed sources, while Foreign Minister Rolandhis, whom we contacted, has given us the following statement:

"It is a fact that the matter is very serious. Without fail, the matter should definitely be resolved within 2 or 3 months at most. Either an agreement for the second phase of the association is signed, or Cyprus will be forced to turn elsewhere."

Mr Rolandhis' statement is very important, and it simultaneously discloses the seriousness of the matter and the size of the problems that are being opened. Moreover, it points out the consequences of continuing under current conditions, particularly in the agricultural production and export sectors.

The competent committee for promoting the association agreement is working intensively at promoting this agreement. But the fact that has not escaped our attention is that: There are also political motives behind the protracted stand of the EEC or, at least, of basic partners of the Community. It is also a fact that Turkey is exerting pressure and that Denktas is trying in every way to avert the agreement.

Nicosia should decide by the end of November, at the latest, and the EEC has been given this timetable. In the event matters do not change, Cyprus, whether it wants to or not, will be compelled to change its mind and look for new markets.

Clarification of Statement

NC101002 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 10 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Referring to comments on his statement that "we will turn elsewhere if the EEC will not satisfy us," Foreign Minister Rolandhis made the following clarification yesterday:

"What I said regarding the Common Market did not mean that Cyprus will pursue economic ties with other bodies. It is natural that in the event that serious obstacles arise in channeling Cypriot products to EEC countries, efforts will be exerted to find other markets.

"At any rate, the government is continuing its extensive consultations toward finalizing the negotiations on the terms of the second stage of Cyprus-EEC association agreement."

KIPRIANOU GREETS HUNGARIAN PRESIDENT LOSONCZI DURING STOPOVER

NC101520 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Hungarian President Pal Losonczi made a brief stopover at Larnaca Airport at noon today while enroute to Africa. The Hungarian president and his entourage were welcomed by President Kiprianou.

The president of the republic stated that he had a very useful exchange of views with the Hungarian president on bilateral and international issues and that he also expressed the appreciation of Cyprus for Hungary's consistent support of the Cypriot people's struggle for a just solution of their problem in accordance with the UN resolutions. President Kiprianou also said that he explained to the Hungarian leader the Greek Cypriots' best hopes toward resumption of the dialogue and their views on the Cypriot issue in general.

President Kiprianou added: I can say that our views [on the Cypriot issue] coincide, as they also coincide on international problems. Most certainly there is mutual interest in further strengthening bilateral relations. The president of the republic said he accepted an invitation by the Hungarian president to visit Hungary and that the Hungarian president simultaneously accepted an invitation to visit Cyprus. The president of the republic expressed the hope that, in the very near future, they would have an exchange of visits, which would contribute even more to strengthening relations and cooperation between Hungary and Cyprus.

In his statement, President Losonczi expressed particular pleasure over his meeting with the president of the republic, with whom, he said, he had an exchange of views on bilateral and international issues. Losonczi said: On most issues, our views are identical or very close. He reiterated that Hungary supported the unity, nonalignment, territorial integrity and sovereignty of Cyprus, stressing that his country had outlined this stand at international forums. The Hungarian president further stressed his country's close relations with Cyprus, adding that his brief visit was another proof of the warm bilateral relations. In conclusion, he expressed the hope that he would soon have the opportunity to welcome President Kiprianou to Hungary.

IRAQI MINISTER'S CONTACTS END IN 'POSITIVE ATMOSPHERE'

[Text] Iraqi Culture and Information Minister Latif Nasif Jasim ad-Dulaymi, who arrived in Ankara on an official visit yesterday, has concluded his contacts. The Turkish and Iraqi delegations headed by Minister of State and Acting Foreign Minister Ekrem Ceyhun and Ad-Dulaymi, respectively, met today and discussed the economic and political aspects of Turkish-Iraqi relations. Foreign Ministry officials said that the talks, which were held in a positive atmosphere, will contribute to (?improving) relations between the two countries. The visiting Iraqi minister will leave Turkey tomorrow morning.

TERCUMAN Commentary

NC110832 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 10 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Fahir Armaoglu: "Our Relations With Iraq"]

[Text] The visit by the Iraqi Minister of Culture and Information, which began in Ankara yesterday, is seen as an effort on the part of Iraq to improve Turkish-Iraqi relations, which have cooled off in recent months. The Iraqi minister has brought Prime Minister Demirel a message from Iraqi head of state Saddam Husayn. This indicates that Iraq realizes that the strange policy it has pursued in recent months has not and will not yield good results. Consequently, Iraq has felt the need to establish direct contact in order to improve its relations with Turkey.

It is worth noting, however, that the Iraqi minister of culture and information was not invited to Turkey by the Turkish minister of culture or the minister of tourism and publicity, but by the state minister, who is a step higher in protocol.

This gesture on the part of the Turkish Government must be accepted as an indication of Turkey's good will and of the importance it attaches to Saddam Husayn's desire and efforts for better relations with Turkey. In this way, the prestige of the Iraqi head of state who, in recent months, has extensively damaged Turkish-Iraqi relations through his own mistakes, has been protected by the Turkish Government. In other words, the improvement of these relations is not being undertaken by Iraq unilaterally. It is being realized through the joint efforts of both sides. If the Iraqi Government does not repeat its last mistake it would be natural to expect mutual sacrifices for the maintenance of good-neighborly relations between both countries.

This new Iraqi initiative is also significant for another reason. Instead of coming into direct contact with the Turkish Government in order to improve its relations with Turkey, the Iraqi Government has, in recent months, wrongly chosen to address itself to the NSP and its leader, Necmettin Erbakan. However, the strong reaction of Turkish public opinion to Necmettin Erbakan's visit to Iraq has shown Iraqi leaders how inappropriate such a policy was. For this approach, which the Iraqi Government embarked upon, has further entangled matters. So, it is never too late to mend the situation.

On the other hand, additional factors that have led Iraq to improve its relations with Turkey are connected with recent developments in the Middle East. On one hand, Iraq's increasing involvement in armed conflict with Iran; and on the other, Iraq's position outside the Syrian-Libyan alliance has compelled it to improve its relations with Turkey. Whatever the reason, the maintenance of truly sincere relations between Turkey and Iraq gratifies Turkey as well.

SOVIET AMBASSADOR SIGNS 2-YEAR CULTURAL AGREEMENT

[Text] An agreement on the 1980-1981 cultural and scientific program between Turkey and the Soviet Union was signed in Ankara today. The agreement was signed for Turkey by Berhan Ekinci, the deputy director of the Bilateral Cultural Relations Department of the Foreign Ministry Cultural Affairs Directorate General, and by Soviet Ambassador to Ankara Aleksey Rodinov on behalf of his country. Cultural and scientific programs between Turkey and the Soviet Union are signed on a 2-year basis. The programs stipulate the principles according to which artists and scientists can pay mutual visits as well as the framework of activities in these fields.

ERBAKAN RETURNS FROM LONDON ISLAMIC MEETING

TA110850 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan returned to Turkey last night after he participated in a meeting of the Islamic Council of Europe in London. The meeting was working on a human rights declaration by Islamic countries. In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Erbakan said that he had returned to Turkey earlier than scheduled because he wanted to be present in the National Assembly meetings. He added that he hoped that there would be a quorum in the assembly tomorrow so that the Grand National Assembly could fulfill all its tasks.

RPP PARLIAMENTARIANS ISSUE PARTY ANNIVERSARY STATEMENT

[Text] RPP Turkish Grand National Assembly Group has issued a statement saying that the party will exert every effort to help Turkey overcome the crisis and the dark period without deviating from the party's democratic leftist policy. The Grand National Assembly group issued a statement on the occasion of the party's 57th anniversary. Pointing out that very difficult conditions reign in Turkey, the statement reiterated the view that fascism is mounting with the support of the government. Noting that close to 3,000 citizens have been killed in terrorist incidents in the last 10 months and that these incidents have at certain places reached the dimension of massacres, the statement added that various administrators, instead of trying to prevent these incidents, were consciously instigating them.

Noting that apart from political terror there exists an economic terror that crushes limited-income groups, the statement said: The RPP Turkish Grand National Assembly Group is aware of the great task that befalls the party because of the current conditions in Turkey and believes that the party, together with the people, will be successful in performing this duty. This duty is to save our democracy from the enemies of democracy, the economy from profiteers who are dependent on foreign sources and the people from political and economic terror.

The statement said the party, through its democratic leftist program, has constantly renewed itself in accordance with the changing social conditions and the wishes of the people. The statement added that the party, together with millions of its supporters, is a guarantee for democracy, national independence, the Ataturk reforms and the Turkish Republic. Noting that the leftist line of the party and its adjustments to this line in accordance with the changing conditions of society were, at times, becoming the subject of unjust and contradictory comments, the statement said: There are those who wish to wrongly protray the party's leftist line, and there are also those who have claimed that the party is moving toward the center and even the right. It has become evident with time that all these claims are invalid. Those who tried to deceive the nation by accusing the RPP of pursuing a more leftist line than that stipulated in its program have failed. The statement said that it is the duty of every party member to preserve party unity and solidarity and to refrain from creating exploitable opportunities.

EGYPT'S MUBARAK VISITS VIENNA, TALKS WITH KREISKY

AU111238 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 11 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] On the periphery of yesterday's government caucus, Egyptian Vice President Husni Mubarak met Chancellor Bruno Kreisky for a talk on the situation in the Middle East which lasted over 1 and 1/2 hours. Mubarak then left the Austrian capital.

At a press conference the Egyptian vice president expressed the view that the forthcoming summit meeting between the Egyptian president and the Israeli prime minister would have to be successful since otherwise grave consequences would ensue. The summit meeting will take place after the U.S. elections. A preparatory conference is scheduled for the second half of October. In Mubarak's opinion, Israel will have to build bridges in order to restore the mutual trust. These bridges must, of course, also include East Jerusalem, Mubarak said, adding that the Jerusalem question is at present the central issue of the whole problem.

Chancellor Bruno Kreisky expressed the hope that the participants in the forthcoming Socialist International congress in Madrid would reject both the treatment of the Palestinian mayors by Israel and Israel's position on East Jerusalem. Kreisky said that he regarded his Middle East mission as essentially fulfilled: He had successfully endeavored for years to draw the European public's attention to the problem of the Middle East conflict. Now he would carefully watch the further developments, he said, and would continue to advocate the fulfillment of the just claims of the Palestinians.

ITALY'S COLOMBO ENDS VISIT, PAHR 'FULLY SATISFIED'

[Summary] On the 2d and last day of his visit to Austria Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo paid a visit to parliament. He later resumed his working talks with Austrian Foreign Minister Pahr at the Foreign Ministry. He then attended a luncheon given in his honor by Pahr at Pallavicini Palace, called on Archbishop Cardinal Koenig, and in the evening gave a dinner for Pahr at the Italian Embassy.

"Foreign Minister Pahr declared after his talks with Colombo that he was 'fully satisfied' with the working talks. In addition to the South Tirol problem transportation questions and other bilateral issues as well as international problems were discussed." In his toast at the luncheon for Minister Colombo, Pahr paid tribute to the progress made toward implementing the South Tirol "package" agreement but urged the fulfillment of the still pending points of that agreement. Regarding the Madrid CSCE followup conference, Pahr said he hoped for new stimuli for detente but had some misgivings that the Afghanistan invasion and the recent indications of a new intensification of the arms race might result in a strained climate in Madrid.

At a Vienna press conference Minister Colombo declared that the Italian Government would endeavor to implement the still pending points of the South Tirol agreement, and stressed the Rome government's firm intention to expand the bilateral economic and political relations with Austria. He stressed that Austria could count on Italy's support regarding the economic wishes vis-a-vis the EC. Regarding the Madrid conference Colombo said that it would offer a good opportunity to resume the dialogue on the Afghanistan question.

GENSCHER REACTS TO MILITARY COUP IN TURKEY

LD121034 Hamburg DPA in German 0919 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] Freiburg, 12 Sep (DPA)--Following the military coup in Turkey, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher said today that he hopes that conditions in Turkey would return to normal as soon as possible. In an interview with BADISCHE ZEITUNG in Freiburg, Genscher added, according to the paper, that the West should be able to expect Turkey to live up to its alliance commitments. This includes not only the military commitments but also respect for the democratic values which are the guiding principles of the North Atlantic pact.

MATTHOEFER: DECISION ON CONTINUING AID TO TURKEY OPEN

[Excerpt] Bonn, 12 Sep (DPA)--A decision on whether the Western industrial countries will maintain the financial aid for Turkey after the military coup remains open for the time being. Federal Finance minister Matthoefer, SPD, who organized the latest aid for Ankara's balance of payments, totaling $3 billion, said in Bonn today that it is not yet possible to assess the events. Matthoefer stressed that like many others he had been taken by surprise. He expressed concern at the arrest of democratic politicians in Turkey.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON CSCE MEETING IN MADRID

LD111236 Hamburg DPA in German 0028 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Saarbruecken, 11 Sep (DPA)--Commenting on the CSCE conference in Madrid, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher said in an interview with Saarland Radio on Wednesday evening that "nobody here intends to turn the Madrid conference into a tribunal." It should be possible to achieve progress at this conference in giving effect to the Helsinki Final Act on people and the cooperation between states. It was right therefore to say that "we are going to Madrid with constructive ideas." Genscher stressed the German desire to make the Madrid conference a success and to save it from a fate like the one that befell the conference in Belgrade 2 years ago. Asked whether Afghanistan would be among the subjects to be discussed at the CSCE conference, Genscher did not at first give a direct reply. He thought it correct, however, to say that politicians in the Federal Republic taking a contrary view should be told that "the policy of detente cannot be seen as detached from the international situation."

HUNGARY'S PUJA CONTINUES TALKS WITH LEADERS

Genscher Dinner Speech

DW111132 Bonn DIE WELT in German 11 Sep 80 P 2

[Gottfried Capell dispatch: "Genscher Reminds Moscow of Nonintervention Edict"]

[Text] Bonn--During the first meeting between high-ranking representatives of the Federal Republic and of an East European state since the events in Poland, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher stressed with great emphasis that the Polish people and the Polish Government must "be responsible for solving their own problems." In a speech during a dinner given in honor of the Hungarian foreign minister, Frigyes Puja, Genscher said in Bonn yesterday that the Federal Government strictly abides by this line. "Anyone who, despite this, expresses unjustified charges as if a judge in other people's affairs, renders the political climate in Europe an ill service and must himself accept being reminded of the nonintervention edict."

This passage was assessed in Bonn yesterday as a reply to Soviet charges that Western forces interfered in the latest developments in the People's Republic of Poland.

In his dinner speech Genscher drew attention to the favorable development of the bilateral relations between Hungary and the Federal Republic. Above all, he mentioned the economic sector and in doing so referred to the fact that Hungary is third amongst the most important Eastern trade partners of the FRG and that 378 cooperation agreements exist between the two countries at the business level. Genscher also stressed the improvement in cultural relations between the two states. Reports prior to the visit had said that chances exist for an early exchange of cultural institutes between Hungary and the Federal Republic.

Genscher's dinner speech centered on foreign policy problems, however, which go beyond the bilateral relationship between Bonn and Budapest. Genscher demanded with a view to the Madrid CSCE followup meeting in November that "new, militarily significant, verifiable, and generally binding, confidence-building measures be mapped out." The confidence-building measures should encompass the entire European continent. So far only part of the European part of the Soviet Union is covered for such measures, for example, the mutual announcement of maneuvers of the two military alliances. Genscher said in this context: "Geographically limited confidence would be a contradition in itself." This is why he expressly supported the French proposal which calls for the CSCE followup meeting to "adopt a precisely defined mandate for a conference on disarmament in Europe devoted to confidence-building measures."

Genscher voiced the hope that the forthcoming foreign ministers meeting between Andrey Gromyko (USSR) and Edmund Muskie (United States) will produce headway in limiting medium-range weapons, and that beyond that, the MBFR negotiations in Vienna will score success as well. In unmistakable connection with the Afghanistan crisis Genscher said, besides, that preserving what has been achieved and making further headway will be possible only if the rules of detente in accordance with the CSCE final act "determine the behavior of the participating states, also in their international business." "By its nature," detente is "indivisible," he said.

Meeting With Schmidt

LD110930 Hamburg DPA in German 0844 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Bonn, 10 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Schmidt received in Bonn today Hungarian Foreign Minister Frigyes Puja for an exchange of views on political matters. The most important subjects were thought to be East-West detente, international sources of tension and economic cooperation between the Federal Republic and Hungary. Puja also had a second talk with Federal Foreign Minister Genscher. In the afternoon he is due to meet President Carstens.

Final Talk With Genscher

[Text] Bonn, 11 Sep (DPA)--Relations between the Federal Republic and Hungary are without any problems. This was stressed by Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and his Hungarian counterpart Puja during a final 2-hour talk in Bonn today.

According to the (Bonn) Foreign Ministry Genscher pointed out that the problem-free relations between Bonn and Budapest could serve as a model for relations between the countries of East and West Europe. The Federal Government wishes to contribute constructively to a further positive development of East-West relations as a whole. It is one of the important factors of European stability that the Federal Republic, in close coordination with its Western allies, pursues a policy of cooperation with the East European states. This policy is characterized by "clarity and predictability" which is of great value, especially in difficult times.

Discussions With Schmidt, Carstens

[Excerpt] Bonn, 11 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Schmidt and Hungarian Foreign Minister Frigyes Puja expressed their satisfaction at the good state of German-Hungarian relations today. According to a government spokesman the chancellor and his visitor from Budapest had a 90-minute discussion on aspects of the CSCE followup conference in Madrid, problems of arms control and the world economic situation. Afterwards, Puja, who is on a 3-day official visit to the Federal Republic, was received by Federal President Carstens. It is not known whether the talks also touched on the situation in Poland. The Hungarian foreign minister is the first senior politician of an East bloc country to visit Bonn since the events in Poland.

Federal President Karl Carstens and Hungarian foreign minister Frigyes Puja in a meeting today mainly discussed the situation in Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East. A federal president's office spokesman said that Carstens also expressed concern over the threat to world peace from developments in this region. Puja returns to Hungary tomorrow.

STRAUSS ASKS DGB TO AID POLISH UNIONS

LD111252 Hamburg DPA in German 0917 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] Munich, 11 Sep (DPA)--The CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship, Franz Josef Strauss, has addressed an urgent request to DGB Chairman Vetter that the German Trade Union Federation, as one of the biggest free trade unions in the world, should extend active solidarity to the Polish workers and give them every possible organizational and material support in their efforts to set up free trade unions. In his letter to Vetter, released by the Bavarian CSU executive, Strauss said that he was ready to contribute a substantial sum of money for this purpose. "We have here an opportunity to help the people in Poland themselves and not just prop up the rulers of a bankrupt totalitarian system," Strauss said. We Germans must not leave the Polish people in the lurch in their struggle for freedom. The Polish workers should know that they are not alone in their struggle.

POPULATION POLLED ON EFFECT OF POLISH STRIKES

DW111210 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 11 Sep 80 p 6

[Kurt Raumann report: "The Germans Do Not Believe There Is Danger of War"]

[Text] Frankfurt, 10 September--Foreign developments have hardly ever moved the German people as much as did the strikes in Poland. But only every fourth person believe that a danger of war could emanate from this situation. The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, however, created concern among almost half the populace (56 percent) that war could break out.

The Allensbach Opinion Poll Institute during the week of 22-30 August asked a representative sample of the population (1,137 persons) the following question: "Do you or don't you believe that the events in Poland have created a real danger of war?" Some 63 percent answered that they did not believe it, 19 percent feared it, and 18 percent had no opinion or were undecided. After the attack on Afghanistan only one third (31 percent) of the populace ruled out the danger of war; some 13 percent were undecided.

In their assessment of political events there is as a rule a clear difference between the followers of the three Bundestag parties. In assessing the danger of war after the outbreak of the strikes, however, this was not the case: Some 60 percent of CDU/CSU followers, 66 percent of FDP followers and 70 percent of SPD followers did not believe in it. Almost everybody had heard or read of the events in Poland (98 percent) and Afghanistan (99 percent).

The mood is not as contradictory as it seems at first glance--the mood after the invasion of Afghanistan and during the strikes in Poland. In both cases there was a desire not to become involved. In the case of Afghanistan this could have been avoided best by exaggerating the danger of war.

The danger of war was mentioned for the first time in public when Federal Chancellor Schmidt warned in April against developments which in 1914 had led to World War I. "We cannot afford making gestures of strength," the chancellor said at that time, adding: "and no vigorous signs of rigidity. We are fed up with that." The day before he had stated that the two world powers did not have a "strategy sufficient to avoid war."

The chancellor's warnings seem to correspond to the tenor of opinion in the Federal Republic. A majority wants if possible to avoid everything that could provoke or even irritate the Soviet Union. Even open demonstrations of sympathy for the striking Poles are considered problematic. Only 29 percent agreed with the opinion that the Federal Government ought to show understanding for the strikes in Poland because the demands for well-being and freedom warrant open sympathy on the party of the Germans.

Some 52 percent, however, decided in favor of the suggested answer: "I see this differently; even if we feel sympathy for the strikers in Poland and their demands, the Federal Government ought to maintain restraint in order not to further aggravate the situation which is tense anyway." This opinion was shared by more than half of the SPD and FDP followers and also by a relative majority of CDU/CSU followers (46 percent).

A formulation experiment shows how important an atmosphere of "detente" is for the people. When one asks whether some German banks and the Federal Government should give the Polish Government a DM1.2 billion credit, some 46 percent are rather against it and only 29 percent are "rather for it."

But a completely different result is achieved if one puts the following question, as the Allensbach Institute did to half the group of people questioned: "I find it correct to give the credit to Poland, even if we do not agree with the regime in Poland. It is most important to contribute with this economic help to eliminate a hotbed of unrest." Some 44 percent agree with this suggested answer. One third (33 percent) picked the other suggested answer: "I find that Poland should not be given a credit. The present unrest demonstrates that the money is used only for keeping an undemocratic regime in power."

As early as August, only 26 percent believed that the Soviets would invade Poland "if the Polish Govermaent fulfilled the demands of the strikers for press freedom, free trade unions and freedom of the church." But only 47 percent of those questioned who were older than 14 said that the Soviets would "not risk" it. In the meantime, however, fewer rather than more voters believe in an invasion.

There has been quite some thought given to whether the events in Poland could touch off a change in the climate of opinion in the Federal Republic and curtail Schmidt's election chances. The answers to questions in connection with the strikes in Poland do not indicate it; they much rather indicate that the climate of opinion has not changed considerably.

STRAUSS INTERVIEWED ON CAMPAIGN ISSUES, PLATFORM

DW111257 Bonn RHEINISCHER MERKUR in German 12 Sep 80 p 3

[Interview by reporters Anton Boehm and Heinrich Stubbe with Franz Josef Strauss, CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor and minister- president of Bavaria--date, place not given]

[Text] RHEINISCHER MERKUR: Mr Minister-President, you have just come from a campaign meeting. You look optimistic. Does Franz Josef Strauss have other moods too, such as after the Hamburg events with their emotional outbursts by young people? Does anger dominate perhaps?

Strauss: I do not say anything against these mainly young demonstrators who should not be mistaken for all the youth, I criticize those who incited them from their desks or microphones. I feel neither anger nor embarrassment in this context, but pity and surprise if anything, as well as concern that political discussion in the Federal Republic has taken the form it has in our era of affluence. What is taking place here is an ongoing breach of the constitution, because freedom of opinion and freedom of speech, which are constitutionally of the same value, are elementary prerequisites for every liberal parliamentary democracy in a constitutional state.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: Let us discuss the most recent event, the developments in Poland. There is still cause for concern over the outcome. If you were the government chief, would you have acted differently than the Federal Government, namely, with less restraint?

Strauss: I believe that the question covers too short a period. It was known that Poland's economy was bankrupt, known before the strikes had broken out, it was everybody's secret long before that. I always have believed that Mr Gierek had become more and more removed from the working class, and that he was more of a Soviet governor than an administrator of Polish interests. This was a man who prompted me to be a bit more careful with regard to inviting him and not exerting massive pressure on the banks, granting him a firm credit beforehand, a credit of 1.2 billion with a federal guarantee of several hundred million.

It is not a matter of acting with utter political rigidity, but it is a matter of asking oneself most precisely what would serve normalization in Poland, what would serve the benefit of the people and what would also serve the strengthening of the regime. This is a corrupt and bankrupt regime. The socioeconomic system in Poland very clearly demonstrates the weakness of communism.

I have never kept secret my opinion that in all our economic connections with the Warsaw Pact countries we must ask ourselves over and over again whether we are not just supporting an antidemocratic system, and whether we are not supporting stepped-up, boundless armament by the Warsaw Pact countries which goes beyond all needs and which grossly contradicts the social results an armament at Moscow's command.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: You have accused the federal chancellor in your speeches of harboring a neutrality of values with regard to East-West relations....

Strauss: I do....

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: ...We know that our country because of its central location must be on good terms with all its neighbors, and that therefore it must try to be on tolerable terms with the East bloc also. Would an Ostpolitik dominated by you link one thing with the other, that is, our membership in the alliance with good-neighborly relations with the East?

Strauss: In connection with an answer to your question by looking at recent events I must say that Schmidt has become very culpable because he, as the chancellor of an ally who depends most on America, broke the moral isolation of the Soviet Union with his pompous visit to Moscow.

At that time, especially as the first of the government chiefs of NATO countries, he should not have gone to Moscow after the Afghanistan events. He made speeches there, which certainly does not represent treason; I have never said that. But I have said that the contents of the letter he passed on as Washington's mailman was a foul trick; the offer contained in the letter had always existed. It is not arrogant but rather untrue for Schmidt to say that he caused the big powers to talk to each other again. U.S. Secretary of State Muskie had talked to Mr Gromyko in Vienna long before Schmidt went to Moscow.

I would not have invited Mr Gierek, the representative of a communist system, to my private house, either.

The intention to meet Honecker was announced in December 1979 at the SPD congress in Berlin by Schmidt himself. An unusual form of announcing such a meeting; it was probably was meant to appease the SPD leftist. Then came the events in Afghanistan; Helmut Schmidt's invitation was cancelled. But he continued to proclaim his interest in meeting Honecker, and eventually directions came from Moscow, addressed to Warsaw as well as East Berlin, as well as German-German relations to help in breaking Moscow's isolation. Mr Honecker stated in an interview in early July that not even a relaxation of travel restrictions can be achieved as long as the Federal Republic is not prepared to recognize a separate GDR citizenship. In other words: Mr Honecker set up obstacles from the very outset, obstacles Helmut Schmidt cannot overcome.

There is no need to insult Mr Brezhnev by saying that he is a criminal, or to say that Mr Honecker and Mr Gierek are monsters, but one can still be sharp in the matter and draw a clear line with regard to the priority of values.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: Once again, Mr Strauss, if you were to pursue an active policy toward the East, what would it be like?

Strauss: More dignity, less chumming it up. More restraint, more clarity. I could afford to do this because I would not have a split party in dealing with all decisive problems of German domestic and most of all German foreign policies, a party where I would not have to appease contrasting opinions on the same subject, calming them down temporarily.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: It seems that our election campaign is mainly a personal dispute, although factual issues actually ought to dominate, because only they can clearly outline the differences. Can you imagine a Franz Josef Strauss who once said that he was more of a parliamentary than a governmental type, can you imagine him conducting only a factual election campaign?

Strauss: If you listen to my campaign speeches, you will note that I deal in detail even at mass meetings with a number of factual problems in order to demonstrate the differences between us and the government policy. Of course, one cannot avoid saying something about the persons who incorporate individually their own election program. I state the priorities of our policy in every speech: First: peace and freedom, not peace through gradual capitulation, through chumming up to somebody or by giving in. There must be pax Americana and not pax Sovietica. There must be a functioning alliance as a real life insurance for us, and not a paper guarantee from Moscow. Second: energy and raw materials, the whole sphere of nuclear energy. The third point is an efficient, dynamic market economy with management initiative, not least as a guarantee for social services.

The danger here is not that the market economy could be eliminated overnight through a revolutionary act or a legislative act, and that it could be replaced by a planned economy. But the businessman's way of thinking has begun to suffer for three reasons: first, due to taxes and revenues; second, due to bureaucratic decreeing with a growing number of laws and regulations, as well as an unbelievable amount of directives, and third, due to a flood of economic programs.

I am against high investment contributions for productive plants. It is not right to maintain that the CDU/CSU and Strauss represent the interests of managers while the other side represents the interests of workers and employees. We are for a functioning market economy with all the difficult risks and dangers the managers must accept in making a management decision without state financial support.

The next main point of my campaign speeches is the reintroduction of dynamic pensions determined by gross wages, equal rights for men and women with regard to the pension law, and the addition of 4 pension years, free of contribution, for every woman per child she has born. Then there is the field of internal security, crime, terrorism, and the enemies of a democratic system in public service.

I must point out the following, however: If one can hardly be heard in mass demonstrations due to audible intimidation, it is technically impossible to discuss factual problems in detail.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: Let us assume the outcome of the elections will be as you want it to be. The switches for the eighties cannot be set immediately as you plan, because laws, treaties and regulations cannot be eliminated from one day to the next. What would an immediate program of a Federal Government under Strauss look like?

Strauss: It would probably go beyond the framework of our interview if I were to discuss every problem in detail. But let us pick out one problem, namely state debts. Most of all, it is not the size of the debts that is so alarming but the short time in which the debts have accumulated. All the administrations up to 1969 in 20 years had reached 14 billion in net credits--and in 1980 already, just 11 years later, just the interest rates alone for the debts amount to 14 billion. Since Schmidt has twice been in power ince 1969, debts are made annually that previously had taken 20 years.

You ask, what will you do? First of all I would promulgate a policy guideline and instruct the finance minister to envisage in the yearly budget proposal a 1 to 2 percent lower growth rate in expenditures under the federal budget than the anticipated growth of the gross national product. The ministers, the ministries, must then split up the increase between them. You cannot say, discontinue the borrowing--this would mean a collapse in the system--but the return to solid finance policy is a long journey. This journey will take at least 10 years, I believe it will even be 15 years. Still, the objective will be attained only if the first step is taken. You cannot rush along here with seven-league boots as this would produce political difficulties, social problems and all sorts of adverse phenomena. But it is necessary to start some time.

RHEINISHCHER MERKUR: Mr Minister-President, the CDU/CSU has promised considerable improvements in family policy and in pension policy. You said once that the limits of the welfare state have been reached. How can such promises be implemented at all within these limits?

Strauss: It is legitimate to raise this question. To begin with, I do not think that all social standards can be retained without changes, especially where social benefits at best represent a desirable improvement and relief but not genuine need. Secondly, nobody can work miracles or rely on the printing press--in the Bavarian vernacular we would say a ducat-dropping donkey. The objective rather is to turn the permanently unemployed, roughly half a million, from recipients of unemployment benefits into tax and dues payers again.

The deterioration of the financial basis of the pension insurance, a basis which we had created in 1957 and on the whole retained intact for 20 years, has been caused by the growing unemployment. After all, 1 million unemployed people means about DM10 million in unemployment benefits or about DM10 billion less in taxes and dues. Unless the precondition of a recovery, that is the reduction in the number of unemployed is fulfilled part of our program, too,cannot be financed, and I have said so quite frankly.

I find, furthermore, that the war victims budget, which began with about DM3 billion, now amounts to DM13 billion. By the year 2010 there will not be any war victims from World War I anymore. What I therefore would like to achieve is that the war victims budget not be drained from all possible sides even now, that it is not dispersed, as it were. I always put it this way: What the taxpayer has raised for the liquidation of a policy of death he will have to raise in future for the mobilization of life. This applies to family policy, and this holds true also and above all for the pensions as well as the recognition of 4 years each of pension eligibility for child per woman.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: The chancellor has said in addressing the voters--and perhaps it was addressed more to the FDP--that if he had an absolute majority hardly anything would change in his government's policy. Does this mean that the FDP is no longer needed as a decelerating force?

STRAUSS: I do not think that the FDP can prevent what an SPD would do if it were allowed to. This means that the FDP does decelerate but it does not change. The train is slowing down and arriving later, but it arrives at the same station on which the legend can be read: "Socialist social system." Just take Mr Schmidt's 7 August interview with KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER. In his reply to the last question he lost his wisdom. To a pertinent question he said: What do you want? Mr Lambsdorff is fulfilling a specific function, namely, recruiting voters away from the DCU/CSU and not from the SPD.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: Helmut Schmidt's covert domestic force are the trade unions. They represent a large group of voters as the representatives of the workers. Surely you, too, wish to have the workers as supporters. Does your proposal concerning the safeguarding of the coal-and-steel codetermination system play a role in this respect?

Strauss: Had I expressed myself differently the choir's chant would be: There you have it, he fails to muster any understanding for the workers, he does not have any understanding for codetermination, he is an enemy of the trade unions. First, for a politician it is absolutely legitimate to gain worker votes. Secondly, I never made any bones about the fact that I am against the introduction of codetermination of equal footing throughout the economy. That is to say, against the transposition of the coal-and-steel model to all capital corporations even if they are not operating in the coal and steel branch.

But if a corporation like Mannesmann has now been subject to the coal-and-steel model for nearly 30 years and subsequently is less active in the coal and steel sector than in other branches as a result of the technical-industrial development and the concomitant restructuring, then I would like to say that it would be wrong to insist on principles and thus cause social tensions and antagomisms.

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: Just recently you mentioned a Christian realism with which alone it is possible to make politics. What do you mean by that?

Strauss: It is my opinion that you cannot prevail in this world with an uncompromising ultra-rigorism adapted to the Christian code of morals. If I propose to attain a tolerable compromise in which I cannot prevail with everything but with what is essential, then I do not think it is correct to say: Everything or nothing.

By this attitude you would hold your flag high, to be sure, and ensure for yourself the reputation of an uncompromising, orthodox, firmly principled soldier of Christ. But you will attain practically nothing in this world that way. The characteristics which people try to attribute to me would rather lead to the conclusion that I advocate my views uncompromisingly, adamantly, stubbornly, intransigently, with teeth bared and bloodshot eyes, as it were. All this is just propaganda, and more and more citizens recognize it as such, too. How many compromises did I make when I was finance minister in the grand coalition? And I attained a lot in doing so!

RHEINISCHER MERKUR: Is the CDU/CSU interested in express support by the churches? What is your opinion about the so-called equidistance of the churches to all parties?

Strauss: I think an equidistance of the church to all political parties is nonsense. In the case of the churches this would lead to a value renewal, to political ascetism, an abstinence which nearly would be tantamount to a denial of the ecclesiastical mandate. I do not think that the churches should make propaganda for one party. My generation of politicians--this was made up of the young people after World War II--advocates views entirely different from some clerically-minded politicians of the older generation. I never asked the cardinal or the land bishops for their endorsement of my candidacy, just to be able to face the delegates then and say, be it in the voting district or be it at the party congress, the cardinal desires my candidacy, the land bishop supports my candidacy. This is not in the character of our generation, the war generation.

In innumerable internal party speeches, in camera as well as in public, I have always said this: We are not the receivers of orders from the prelates and members of the high council, nor are we the executive organ in the secular sphere for ecclesiastical instructions. We are laymen, adult laymen trying to stay in the realism of the Christian code of morals--I am expressing myself with great care--and whose task it is to find objective, expedient solutions within the framework of this ethical order. Sometimes this may well lead to differences of opinion with the church.

COMMENTATOR CRITICIZES 'DETERIORATION' OF U.S. ARMY

DW111235 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 11 Sep 80 p 12

[Commentary signed Me: "Deteriorating Army"]

[Text] The justification for pulling out 6,000 noncommissioned officers and specialists from the U.S. Armed Forces stationed in Europe almost causes one to have more doubts than ever. The U.S. Army admits that its divisions in its own country are in such poor shape with regard to personnel that the forces stationed abroad must give them masses of experts from the NCO corps to offset the situation halfway--without consideration for the loss of quality of American division stationed in Europe and in Korea. The smaller NATO allies have been complaining for quite some time that the leading power of the alliance is allowing its own armed forces to deteriorate: There are too many pregnant girls in the U.S. Army, too many dope addicts, too many homosexuals, too many illiterates, and way too few people warranting the name "soldier" or "specialist." The evil seems to increase. A world power wanting to remain what it is must either pay considerable money for its armed forces or it must introduce compulsory service. It seems that the Americans want to avoid both. It cannot go on this way for long.

BARRE DISCUSSES STRATEGY IN EVENT OF ARMED CONFLICT

NC111503 Paris AFP in English 1449 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 11 Sep (AFP)--French Premier Raymond Barre said today that in the event of armed conflict, France would consider to be "directly concerned" by any enemy move threatening the independence of its "immediate neighbor." Mr. Barre made his statement in a speech before the French Institute of National Defense Studies in which he outlined current French strategic thinking.

The passage about what area France considered its military responsibility came in the context of a justification of France's independent nuclear strike force. Mr. Barre declared: "The dialectic of the relationship between Russians and Americans demonstrates why we must remain the masters of our decision whether to engage our forces. We mean to avoid to be drawn into a conflict against our will in cases where our vital interests would not be at stake. In Europe, may I recall, we are directly concerned by the security of our immediate neighbors. We could consequently not remain indifferent regarding any action that would affect their liberty."

France's immediate neighbors to the east are West Germany, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg and neutral Switzerland.

The premier also went into a discussion of the role of the neutron bomb, although France does not yet produce such a weapon. However, French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing suggested the possibility for the future when he said last June 26 that a decision on the matter would be taken between 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Barre warned that if the decision was affirmative, France should still not rely on the neutron bomb alone. The premier recalled that the French concept was one of deterrence--"to avoid war by stopping the process of violence at the very start.

"Our military structure," he went on, "must through its diversity, complementarity and flexibility permit our head of state to influence the decisions of the adversary's leadership at any moment in a developing crisis--even if from the start it took on the aspect of an armed conflict, either one concerning us directly or one only affecting our neighbors and allies before reaching us."

Mr. Barre said that neutron bombs might be substituted for tactical atomic weapons as "more flexible and more credible" arms "on any type of theater." France should not, however, seek shelter behind this weapon as if it were "an impregnable Great Wall of China."

GOVERNMENT TO SEEK 18-PERCENT DEFENSE BUDGET INCREASE

LD120855 Paris LE MONDE in French 28 Aug 80 p 8

[Jacques Isnard report: "1981 Draft Defense Budget Apparently Totals More Than Fr104 Billion"]

[Text] The Defense Ministry is putting the finishing touches to a 1981 draft military budget for France which, according to assessments made in discussions between the various departments concerned, could total more than Fr104 billion, excluding pensions (Note: With pensions the proposed 1981 budget totals Fr100 billion. If these initial estimates are accepted after government arbitration, this will be the first time that the defense budget has exceeded Fr100 billion, representing 3.8 percent of what is known as GDP [Gross Domestic Product].

This is a considerable increase--around 18 percent--over the defense spending approved by Parliament for 1980, in other words a total of Fr80.6 billion.

Since the public spending planned for 1981 is Fr610 billion, defense credits should represent around 17 percent of the total state budget. The head of state has asked most ministries to curb their demands for funding aside from the ministries concerned with national defense, law enforcement and scientific research.

However, the "boost" thus been given to defense is most considerable with regard to the financial objectives fixed as early as 1976, when Parliament approved the 1977-1982 military programming law.

Indeed, this 6-year military hardware plan adopted by the National Assembly in May 1976 made provision for a total defense budget for 1981 equivalent to Fr99.99 billion at current values. If the government eventually adopts the sum of Fr104.5 billions for 1981, as all the indications now suggest, national defense will in fact receive an additional 4.6 percent in credits over and above the provisions. In the middle of the presidential election campaign, the line Mr Giscard d'Estaing intends to take in favor of the armed forces is bound to spark off some reactions. However, it will be noted that, despite its regular growth, the defense budget will probably not reach 20 percent of the state budget in 1982 as the military programming law states.

It is true that in 1976 the government took care to specify that this objective should be respected on equal conditions and with identical budgetary structures in the 6 years from 1977 to 1982 and that, since then, circumstances have evolved as have the factors governing the very conception of the state budget.

Similarly, in 1981 the defense minister could have trouble in implementing the distribution of his credits ordered by the military programming law. Indeed, it had been planned to devote 54 percent of the budget to administrative spending and 46 percent to conventional or nuclear technology spending. At present it seems that the Defense Ministry experts are encountering obstacles in controlling administrative spending which, in 1981, could be more than 54.3 percent of total defense credits.

Next year administrative spending (which the experts call section III of the finance law) should rise to Fr56.7 billion and equipment spending (section V) to Fr47.7 billion.

Expressed in appropriations this equipment spending for the development and purchase of conventional and nuclear hardware nonetheless marks an average increase of 19.68 percent. Expressed in program authorizations, which are pledges on investment in the design--spread over several years--of next generation hardware, this equipment spending, in other words Fr64.3 billion in 1981, represents an increase of more than 22 percent over authorizations in 1980.

Aside from a few exceptions, priority has therefore been given to the hardware budget, which is increasing more rapidly than so-called ordinary administrative spending (up by 16 percent). Strategic and tactical nuclear weapons should account for one-third of these hardware credits.

Before the end of this year, a Defense Council meeting will be devoted to chosing a mode of transport--probably a wheeled articulated vehicle--for the surface-to-surface ballistic missile, which is intended to complete the national deterrent force, and to determining the total number of nuclear submarines--probably around 10--which will make up the strategic naval force. A National Assembly debate, distinct from the fall session's budget discussions, will enable the government to explain the main lines of its defense policy.

MITTERRAND ON 'FAILURE' OF POLISH REGIME, EUROMISSILES

LD111311 Paris LE MONDE in French 9 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] Questioned on events in Poland during an interview granted to Europe 1 Press Club on Sunday, 7 September, Francois Mitterrand spoke of "the historic failure of a so-called workers regime which is seeing the working class rise up against it."

The PS first secretary stressed that so far this working class has shown "lucidity, courage and optimism, while keeping within the bounds of reason" in order to avoid a Soviet intervention.

He added: "What does the future hold? I do not wish to make much comment on this because I consider that the Marxist-Leninist system cannot coexist with freedom. At some point there will, therefore, be a confrontation. Knowing that the two systems are incompatible, I hope that wisdom will prevail...and that the Poles will be free."

After expressing the view that Mr Gierek is "an interlocutor that any French head of state could consider to be closer than the others" (the other leaders of Eastern bloc countries LE MONDE note), the PS first secretary stressed that the French Government should "point out in all circumstances that there are eternal principles such as freedom, justice and human rights." He specified: Duty and realism prompt us to hope that the attempt at liberalization may be carried out; foreign leaders must do all they can to ensure that a disaster does not occur, instead of assessing the chances of that disaster taking place."

On this question Mr Mitterrand concluded by hoping that the French position could be "less conciliatory" toward the USSR than it was when the invasion of Afghanistan took place.

The PS first secretary then turned to his usual arguments about the need to renegotiate the Atlantic alliance. In particular he referred to the interview published in our newspaper recently in which he described the alliance as a "hodgepodge." (LE MONDE 31 July) He said: "I need to know who is ensuring the country's security," because "the gravity of current events is in my mind and my heart."

Mr Mitterrand then assessed the reasons why the Soviet weekly NOVOYE VREMYA recently placed him "on the extreme right of the French political chessboard," and said that Moscow attacked him in this way because "I talk about the SS-20 missiles." He explained: "I am opposed to the U.S. Pershing missiles but I am also opposed to the Soviet SS-20. These missiles' range does not enable them to reach the United States; they are intended for us."

After recalling that he is in favor of negotiations on the denuclearization of central Europe and that he wants the SS-20 missiles to go, the deputy for Nievre concluded: "As soon as a French patriot aspires to defend his fellow citizens, he is regarded as being to the right of the extreme right by Soviet thinkers. According to the Soviet's strange classification, the leftwinger does not worry about the SS-20 missiles."

Returning to the question of the Atlantic alliance, Mr Mitterrand said: "I am trying to find out to what extent it may be possible to conclude an alliance in which autonomy in decisionmaking, in other words prior consultation, would be possible. This is an extraordinarily difficult problem to solve.... Would there be time for consultations? Who will make the decision in the event of a nuclear conflict? The United States alone? In that case, I would say that that is unacceptable and return to the (theory of the--LE MONDE note) national sanctuary."

Mr Mitterrand also indicated that he is in favor of France expanding its relations with the entire communist world, but added: "I do not think that these relations can be developed through an accommodating attitude and political self-abasement."

MARCHAIS SENDS MESSAGE TO PZPR'S KANIA

LD121009 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 9 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] Georges Marchais yesterday sent the following message to Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] First Secretary Stanislaw Kania:

"Dear comrade, on the occasion of your election I would like to send to you personally, the PZPR Central Committee and all Polish communists our wishes for success in your activity to solve the problems facing your country and to ensure socialist Poland's social, economic and democratic development.

"I hope to see a continuation and extension of the relations of friendship and solidarity between our two parties--relations to which the meeting I had with Comrade Edward Gierek gave a positive boost, notably promoting peace, disarmament and cooperation between our two countries."

PCF AIDE SCORES PS 'SOLIDARITY' WITH POLISH STRIKERS

LD100919 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 3 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] PCF Politburo member Rene le Guen delivered a speech to PCF members in Seine-Saint-Denis yesterday. He stated in particular:

The agreements signed in Gdansk the day before yesterday are generally positive. They verify the working class' leading role in socialist society. They open up broad horizons for Polish political, social and trade union life--horizons which involve improvements in the country's situation. Aside from these agreements the essential thing is that a decisive question has been raised: the question of a new economic policy which implies structural reforms and reforms in the way the economy is run.

The workers' initiative, their participation and the exercise of their responsibilities may contribute to this, but one objective remains essential: the close liaison which must exist between social progress, economic efficiency and the advance of socialist democracy.

Polish socialism is a system which, like any other, is subject to developments. The future might still bring more than one change in existing structures. These are simply the requirements of life. We Communists resolutely support any change in a progressive direction wherever it takes place. We show solidarity with all movements which bring greater well-being or which struggle to improve man's lot against regression's forces. That is real international solidarity.

Mitterrand and [CFDT leader] Maire have kept quiet about the recent struggles in France; when they are forced to discuss them they merely hope for conciliation and a return to calm. However, they instantly expressed ardent support for the Gdansk strikers. What concerns them is not how the Polish working class is going to contribute to the economic reforms which are vital for moving toward greater efficiency and more social progress but, essentially, the demand for free trade unions--symbol of "their democracy."

We in France have experienced free trade unionism. It was in the name of free trade unionism that the division of the working class--whose harmful consequences are still suffered by the workers faced with the government's antisocial policy--was organized. Moreover since this morning the tone has been set by the main sections of the written and spoken media with PS and CFDT support: to play down the importance of the horizons opened up by the consultations between the Polish United Workers Party, the government and the working class.

They have nerve to state that "it took these events to obtain the elementary freedoms which we have in France." That is distorting the truth and playing down the French workers' struggle.

It took the powerful movement of May 1968 to obtain from the employers recognition of the enterprises' trade union section. That was only 12 years ago, and employers and the government are making every effort to undermine these rights by stepping up pressure and, in many cases, provocations. It is also in France that trade union militants are fired--as at RVI, Renault-Billancourt and Cerich, to mention but a few businesses--and that, in addition, the employers try to truncate the CGT trade unions under cover of dismissals for economic reasons.

It is in France that an all-out campaign is being waged by the government and the employers to try to suppress the right to strike in public services, bills for which have already been submitted.

They also have the nerve to talk of trade union independence from parties when--like Force Ouvriere [workers force] and the CFDT, they take the German, British or Nordic countries trade unions as models--trade unions which are not only linked with the social democratic parties but in which an obligatory contribution to those parties is required in order to be able to take part in the trade union's policy debates.

How does anybody dare to talk about the U.S. labor unions' solidarity, when it is well known that they are often controlled by veritable mafias who have no hesitation in physically liquidating leaders.

No, that is definitely going too far!

The French workers will discover that the only solidarity which the PS and CFDT mention is above all a struggle against socialism--against the only countries in which socialism is being built and developed.

Therefore the workers can appreciate true active and acting international solidarity--the solidarity shown by the PCF and not that shown by those who, like Mitterrand, Rocard or Maire, preach about Poland and socialist countries but lower their voices or keep quiet when the question of Bolivia, the Palestinians, South Korea or San Salvador is mentioned.

BRUSSELS REPORTS MEETING BETWEEN GISCARD, ZAIRE'S MOBUTU

LD111757 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] President General Mobutu Sese Seko is pleased with his talks at the Elysee Palace with President Giscard d'Estaing. The two heads of state asked themsleves what they can do in order to unfreeze the situation in Chad. Other countries such as the Congo, Cameroon, Gabon and the Central African Republic are also reportedly of the opinion--like France and Zaire--that something must be done in Chad. But what? Sending in blue-helmeted UN troops in order to ensure observance of the ceasefire? President Mobutu did not say yes, but he also did not say no. In that case what should be done? We may perhaps find out at an upcoming meeting of central African heads of state.

As for other topics, President Mobutu reassured his French interlocutors, informing them, inter alia, that cooper output has returned to normal.

FOREIGN MINISTER COLOMBO ANSWERS QUESTIONS ON POLICY

Situation in Poland

AU110948 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Rome, September 11 (ANSA)--Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has upheld Italy's discretion in dealing with events in Poland and rejected the notion of some critics that the government's self-restraint was tantamount to sluggishness or indifference.

In his response to the points raised during a parliamentary debate on Italian foreign policy Wednesday, Colombo reiterated the Rome government's stance with respect to the recent wave of labor turmoil in the East European state and the settlement that emerged from it as a combination of "reservedness" and "offer of economic cooperation."

The government's "reserve", he said, stemmed from its respect for the internal affairs of another nation, but discretion, he added, did not mean a lack of understanding for Poland's problems. "None of us believe that the worker's revolt was a purely economic protest", he stated. By the same token, however, "no one can tool himself into believing that the events of recent weeks have changed Poland into a pluralistic society".

Replying to critics of the government's failure to provide the strikers with tangible support, Colombo stated in part:

"But how should we have helped them? By undermining the process of detente? Hurting detente would have hurt the very cause that produced the Polish uprising. Any other stance that was not marked by caution could have unleashed an internal repression and legitimized an external intervention".

The best reaction to the "Baltic breeze" Colombo said about the Gdansk workers' protest and the subsequent agreement, "was to make sure that it keeps blowing".

The Italian diplomatic chief disclosed that Poland's debt toward Italy amounted to 1,200 billion lire while asserting, however, that it did not represent a hindrance to "our country's willingness to grant economic cooperation to the Poles".

CSCE Conference

AU112005 Rome ANSA in English 1901 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] Rome, 11 Sep (ANSA)--The East-West meeting-ground provided by the European Security and Cooperation Conference in Madrid this fall was described by Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo here today as "an opportunity that cannot be missed."

The Madrid round of follow-up talks on the agreements worked out in Helsinki in 1975 was crucial, Colombo said, for retrieving the process of detente. Colombo also voiced Italy's support for the idea of admitting the foreign ministers of the nations attending the conference to the November 11 session.

The occasion for his remarks today about the Madrid gathering was the formal inauguration at the Foreign Ministry building of the Italian CSCE commission, set up for the purpose of making the necessary preparations for the conference. Addressing the commission, whose chairman is M.P. Carlo Russo, Colombo upheld the necessity that "concrete" moves emerged from the Madrid conference in all of the areas slated for debate--security, economic and humanitarian cooperation and human rights.

The Italian diplomatic chief also stood up for the right "to denounce" behavior that was in violation of the principles laid down in the "final act" of the Helsinki Conference.

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and human rights violations in East European countries, he said, "cast a cloud over Madrid." These things, Colombo stressed "cannot be ignored" and will predictably play a role in making the negotiating atmosphere "very tough." But he appeared equally confident that the basic role that the CSCE process played in efforts to restore detente would provide a big enough stimulus to overshadow the negative prospects.

The Italian foreign minister particularly harped on two concepts--the "globality" of detente and the necessity of assuring what he termed "a harmonious and contemporary" development in all of the conference's departments. Italy's conception of detente was said to be inextricably tied to its "globality" and "indivisibility" and the Rome government will insist that these concepts, in the broadest sense of their terms, prevail at the conference, he stated. The presumption to make a distinction between political, military and humanitarian detente, according to Colombo, was unworkable.

Colombo also voiced Italy's readiness as well as the European Nine's to lay the groundwork in Madrid for a European-wide disarmament conference to be held in the near future. The terms of that conference, he added, had to involve measures that would give European military activity a "genuine transparency", reduce the risks of a surprise attack and make sure that the agreements were "enforceable and checkable throughout the entire continent."

The Rome government, Colombo said, expected the commission set up here today to help in the painstaking preparations that will go into determining the stands that Italy will uphold at the conference. The commission, he added, should relate its efforts to the subject groupings slated for debate in Madrid as well as to the "Mediterranean dimension" that Italy will help give the conference.

THREE DEPUTIES REMOVED DUE TO 'ERRONEOUS ATTRIBUTION' OF SEATS

AU100908 Rome ANSA in English 0807 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Text] Rome, September 10 (ANSA)--The Italian parliament lost three M.P.'s yesterday when the lower house approved a request presented by the electoral commission to annul the seats assigned them after the June 3, 1979 elections. The M.P.'s in question are Social Democrat (PSDI) Alberto Bemporad, MSI neofascist Giovanni Pelegatta and Communist (PCI) Mario Calogero Arnone.

The request was approved with 258 votes in favor, 115 opposed and one abstention. A careful examination of all the votes cast in the M.P.'s districts showed that the local court of appeals had erroneously attributed the seats to the three on the basis of the "left-over" votes of the proportional election system.

After the vote, House Speaker Nildje Jotti announced that the M.P.'s will be replaced by Christian Democrat Emilio Revelli, Republican Aldo Gandolfi and Communist Novello Pallanti. The parliament now has one more Christian Democrat and one more Republican, the Communists have the same number of deputies while the PSDI and MSI each lost a member.

ATLANTIC TREATY ASSOCIATION ASSEMBLY MEETS IN FUNCHAL

Sa Carneiro Address

LD111111 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

[Unattributed report: "Soviet Imperialism and Underdevelopment"]

[Text] "The two great dangers confronting the world" are "underdevelopment and Soviet imperialism," the prime minister asserted, addressing the opening session of the 26th General Assembly of the Atlantic Treaty Association, which is taking place in Funchal and is attended by Joseph Luns, Vice Admiral Busby, Prof Robert Osgood, Gen Robert Close and Mario Soares, among others.

In his speech Sa Carneiro began by pointing out that "the island of Madeira, together with the Azores and the mainland, form a geographical area unique in a NATO country." "The Portuguese mainland's importance in NATO's contingency plans and as a base in any situation of conflict in the alliance's area has been emphasized by many observers on various occasions."

"But the importance which Portugal is destined and prepared to assume in the maritime and air sphere is no less great.

"The Azores Archipelago lies midway between the American Continent and the places where armed conflicts involving the allied forces could be located.

"The triangle of the mainland, Madeira and the Azores possesses an exclusive economic zone, which is 18 times larger that the national territory and a maritime and air zone of vital importance for the NATO countries' security.

"Maritime and air traffic in this zone is among the heaviest in the world in both commercial and military terms.

"It is essential that full protection of our trade routes and effective monitoring of our opponents' military movements be ensured.

"Portugal is prepared to shoulder its duties both on its own account and in conjunction with the allied forces. We hope soon to strengthen our ability to discharge these tasks.

"The political events of this year, as far as the NATO countries are concerned, are of unprecedented gravity. What is once more at issue is how the allied countries should respond to the challenges which, one after another, are confronting them. And I am not referring merely to those of a military nature but to all those which in one way or another are jeopardizing our countries' individual and joint security."

Europe's role was then emphasized by the prime minister, since it "has defined stances which enable it to act as a united entity." "This constitutes salutary progress and at the same time a challenge to our generation. This integration is the out come of a process which began a quarter century ago and which is experiencing grave difficulties. It is a process which my country is following with particular interest and to which I believe we could make an important contribution."

"One of the results of our entry into the EEC, which is scheduled for the beginning of 1983, will be that of strengthening unity within the community of nations which form the nucleus of the European contribution to the allied countries' security. Nowhere is Europe's historical role more important today than in Africa."

"The economic and social conditions of over half of the world's population," Sa Carneiro continued, "Are a source of insecurity as real as that represented by the Soviet threat at the political and military level." [paragraph continues]

"These are in fact the two great dangers confronting the world--underdevelopment and Soviet imperialism. The democratic nations cannot observe these conditions of poverty and hunger without feeling obliged to take steps of a practical nature. They must set aside the selfishness which is taking root throughout the industrialized world to embark upon a creative and daring struggle against the poverty and hunger which, unfortunately, even now dominate the world."

"Courage and realism are necessary qualities for it to be possible to achieve anything tangible, and let us not stop at verbal exercises.

"The least developed countries will be unable to extricate themselves from their poverty if they have to continue paying the present prices for the energy which they need in increasing amounts in order to develop.

"Moreover, the pressure to which their balances of payments are subjected in this way do not allow them to acquire the technology which is also essential for transforming and modernizing economic systems.

"The answer must come from the energy-producing countries in their pricing policy with respect to the least developed countries and from the most advanced countries with regard to access to technology by the countries which need it."

Intervention in Afghanistan

The Soviet Union's activity abroad, for its part, was given special attention by the speaker. "The intervention in Afghanistan," he stated, "has revealed to us a new and dangerous pattern of behavior which gives rise to new sources of concern." "Although maintaining channels of communication with the USSR, we cannot accept that economic circumstances and interests alone should lead us to accept totally unacceptable situations."

"Coexisting with our opponents entails the need to negotiate on certain occasions, but also the need to conciliation when the matters at issue are in no way negotiable, even if sacrifices result from this. If we are not prepared for this, then we will be selling out the next generation for some more ease, which, moreover, would be merely ephemeral.

"Nowadays the USSR is the only imperialist power. To understnad its aims in the Middle East, in Africa and in the world in general, we must be aware of this fact. It is within this context that the real significance of the principle of detente should be analyzed.

"We understand detente as a process of coexistence in an atmosphere of confrontation. In a historical perspective, we find that these have been the characteristics of the last few years, even when concepts aimed at cooperation were put forward.

"Detente remains necessary today. But it must be defined from both the geographical and sectional viewpoints: Detente is real only if it is worldwide. And detente is inseparable from deterrence.

"There can be no detente in Europe if it is violated at the threshold of the NATO area, as happened in Afghanistan or in other parts of the world, such as Africa, South America or Southeast Asia.

"But it must also be borne in mind that when regressions are ascertained in the political field and in that of human rights, progress in the economic or military fields will not be possible either.

"This is why in advocating that the allied countries and our Western partners go to Madrid [for the CSCE conference], we do so knowing for certain that there will be no devious ways of evading the truth there, that we know what is negotiable and what is not and that we will go with a clear and firm stance in order to make it triumph."

Exclusive Economic Zone

"Our exclusive economic zone," Sa Carneiro reaffirmed in the final part of his speech, "is almost continuous from the European coast to the mid-Atlantic." "The triangle formed by the Azores, Madeira and the mainland has, as I have already said, indisputable strategic importance. We intend to study all the possibilities of using this factor for the alliance's security, the only limit being the principles defining our independence."

"This effort is also in keeping with the armed forces' need to modernize their equipment and update their operational techniques. The Portuguese Armed Forces have a rare attribute within the sphere of NATO--lengthy combat experience.

"Thus the Portuguese Navy is preparing to purchase three frigates, equipped in such a way as to be able to be integrated into STANAVFORLANT [Standing Naval Force Atlantic] operations and which will bring a new capability for surveillance of Portuguese territorial waters.

"The army is completing the training of the first combined intervention brigade, whose participation this very month in major NATO exercises in areas relatively remote from the national territory is a milestone with a significance to which we attach great importance.

"Last, the air force, which in the geostrategic situation in which Portugal is located has very particular importance, expects to be able to improve its structural capabilities soon with the purchase of new aircraft, including the A-7P.

"This is a coordinated effort, to which the government has devoted itself with total commitment and about which the minister of defense will give you further details over the next few days.

"A small country's effectiveness of action in the international context depends especially on the courage and clarity of its stances and on the stability of its internal situation which serves as a support for them. Together with the unity of the allies and confrontation with our opponents, the political stability which we have achieved in Portugal is the basis which enables us to decide freely and act with the utmost determination in all fields, making Portugal's participation within the NATO framework useful."

General Close's Paper

LD111057 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Sep 80 p 1, 6

[Jorge Feio report: "Establishment of Intervention Force of European NATO Countries"]

[Excerpts] "In order to understand relations between the Europeans and their American allies better, it is sufficient to mention the USSR's principal aim: to attempt to create a rift between the alliance's two principal areas," Dr Sa Carneiro, Portuguese prime minister stated to the 26th General Assembly of the Atlantic Treaty Association, taking place for the first time in Funchal since yesterday.

The session at which the Madeira regional government premier, Joao Jardin, also spoke, stressing the importance of the Atlantic islands in the defense of the West, was dominated, however, by a military paper presented by Gen Robert Close of Belgium on "Soviet Strategy, the Atlantic and the Defense of the West." General Close, who has persistently sought to warn of the West's weakness in defense against a possible attack by the Soviet forces, "which could reach the Rhine in 48 hours," proposed the establishment of a joint intervention force of the European NATO countries, including Portugal, stressing that more cannot be reasonably sought from the American allies. [paragraph continues]

He emphasized: "In the crucial area of the Middle East the Soviets can easily carry out a pincer operation against the Strait of Hormuz from South Yemen and Afghanistan, and would have a superiority of 4 or 5 to 1 over the U.S. intervention forces, and air forces [rotacoes aereas] from southeast Afghanistan, 480 km from the strait, greatly exceeding the aircraft at the disposal of the U.S. aircraft carriers."

For this reason, Europe should immediately take precautions by setting up a mobile force which could tackle this eventuality, because "it is the Europeans who are far more dependent on the oil sources that the Americans, who should do more for their protection."

The same applies to the U.S. plan for reinforcing Europe, since here, too, the Europeans can cherish no illusions about what would await them in the event that they proved incapable of offering protracted resistance on their own to the enemy on European soil until the U.S. allies had time to give them effective assistance. For this using the Benelux ports, as is currently envisaged, would not be sufficient; extensive use of French ports, airports and communication routes would also be required.

PSD OFFICIAL BACKS PREMIER'S STANCE ON EANES REELECTION

LD100929 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 25 Aug 80 pp 7-8

[Unattributed interview with Soviet Democratic Party (PSD) Chairman Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida: "Democratic Alliance Will Not Govern Country If Eanes Is Reelected"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Excerpts] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: To change the subject: Dr Carlos Macedo recently said that the Democratic Alliance would break up if by any chance it did not win the legislative and presidential elections. Do you share this opinion?

Ribeiro de Almeida: I am certain that the Democratic Alliance will win in the two elections which are approaching. When the Portuguese people voted for the Democratic Alliance on 2 December 1979 it was not in order to have a government for 7 months but, rather, one for 4 years. This is why I am convinced of victory for the Democratic Alliance: The 1979 results will be repeated, and I do not even raise this hypothesis.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: And assuming a scenario in which the Democratic Alliance would win the legislative elections and Ramalho Eanes would win the presidential elections....

Ribeiro de Almeida: If General Ramalho Eanes wins the presidential elections and thus becomes president of the republic again, and if, in the meantime, the Democratic Alliance wins the legislative elections, there is a fact which we know: Dr Sa Carneiro has already stated that he would not remain prime minister and thus would not form a government.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But is it Dr Sa Carneiro of the Democratic Alliance which would not form a government?

Ribeiro de Almeida: The statement was made by Dr Sa Carneiro. It is my conviction that, in view of this statement by Dr Sa Carneiro, nobody in the area of the Democratic Alliance would undertake to replace him. I am convinced that the president of the republic would then have to seek a prime minister outside the political area of the Democratic Alliance.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: So that could give rise to a rather paradoxical situation. Assuming that the Democratic Alliance becomes the majority coalition in the legislative elections, the majority would be in opposition in that event and a minority force would be governing....

Ribeiro de Almeida: Without crystal gazing, which I cannot do, since I cannot fully predict what the consequences stemming from this would be, it is my conviction that the most elementary reasons of political solidarity would cause anybody in the Democratic Alliance who might possibly be invited to succeed Dr Sa Carneiro to refuse the invitation to be prime minister.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Would that not perhaps gravely disappoint the electorate who had elected the Democratic Alliance with a majority?

Ribeiro de Almeida: Since there has been--as there has been--throughout these months of Democratic Alliance government a real extraparliamentary opposition, which in fact everybody acknowledges has existed, both on the part of Belem Palace [president's official residence] and on the part of the Restelo Palace [Council of Revolution headquarters], it seems to me that this stance on the part of Dr Sa Carneiro is in keeping with the course of these political events and the institutional conflict, which the government did not begin but which was provoked and conducted throughout all this time. Thus, such a stance, far from disappointing, will lead to a clarification of the situation, which seems essential.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But couldn't Professor Freitas do Amaral be a possible prime minister?

Ribeiro de Almeida: Being able to be prime minister is one thing; agreeing to be prime minister at a specific time is another.

Correlation of Forces in Democratic Alliance

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: It is often said that the PSD, bearing in mind its influence and strength in the country, is subordinate in the Democratic Alliance, and that the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] is the dominant force in the Democratic Alliance.

What do you have to say about these views?

Ribeiro de Almeida: It is not true. It is one of the many weapons with which attempts from outside the Democratic Alliance have unsuccessfully been made to create a bad atmosphere. The Democratic Alliance is an alliance of parties which relegated their party viewpoints and interests to second place in order to find a platform which would serve the national interest. Now, the fact that the Democratic Alliance has been a fine political experience is demonstrated by the fact that after all its seems that not a single political party is taking part in the elections on its own. It seems to have been fruitful, and everybody wants to use the recipe.

Despite the natural difficulties which always exist in terms of policy, both within parties (and this happens in all of them) and in an electoral coalition--as in our case--the Democratic Alliance has conducted its activity with cordial cooperation among the parties comprising it and enviable agreement among the three parties' leaders, and it has become established as Portugal's foremost political force--this is the truth. And attempts have been made by all means to combat and destroy it, and one of the methods of combating and destroying it is to present and invent in the most diverse ways the existence of facts which will create unease, especially at the level of the grassroots party members who have less information and less direct knowledge about what is happening. The PSD has its own strength. The PSD has its own political influence, and the CDS, being the second largest party within the Democratic Alliance, has not secured--nor have I even noticed it seeking to secure--a commanding position within the Democratic Alliance.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In any case, the CDS has sought to secure a greater number of heads of lists, and has in specific sought apparently to place Professor Freitas do Amaral at the top of the list for Oporto--something which was apparently refused by the PSD. Is this correct?

Ribeiro de Almeida: I have heard of this. I was not here when this stage of the lists was discussed (I suppose it coincided exactly with my stay in Peru, where, as you know, I headed the Portuguese official mission). But in any case this was no more than a hypothesis, and it is perfectly legitimate that the CDS should have had this aspiration, which, however, did not go ahead. Our relations were not at all affected by the fact that the solution was different, albeit agreed on by everybody.

Soares Carneiro's Language

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Turning to the presidential elections, certain observers say that General Soares Carneiro's language is difficult to reconcile with the PSD's program, which is regarded as genuinely center-left. Do you believe that is is possible to reconcile General Soares Carneiro's language with the PSD's social democratic program?

Ribeiro de Almeida: The first question which must be asked is whether the analysis which these observers make in uttering this assertion is correct.... And I believe that it is not, because I have already had several meetings--one of them lengthy--with General Soares Carneiro, and I had the opportunity to hear General Soares Carneiro make statements which revealed to me an enlightened intelligence and sound political training, and advocate solutions which are perfectly feasible with respect to the PSD's social democratic program and perfectly in keeping with the Democratic Alliance's election program. So I believe that this concern which has existed on the part of certain observers, and even possibly certain news media, presenting General Soares Carneiro as a rightwinger--or rather, so rightwing that he is out of place as the Democratic Alliance's candidate--is a maneuver entirely similar to, but just as false as, that which we were considering earlier with respect to relations among the parties of the Democratic Alliance.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: So do you mean that you go so far as to regard General Soares Carneiro as being within a center-left area, for instance?

Ribeiro de Almeida: I regard General Soares Carneiro as a person who is perfectly in keeping with the basic principles of the Democratic Alliance's election program, and whose thinking in no way conflicts with the PSD's program, and I regard him, above all, as a patriot, a military man and a citizen with a precise idea of his civil duties, who will therefore quite certainly place his ability at the service of the country and the Portuguese republic, if he is elected.

REVOLUTION COUNCIL COMMENTS ON ROLE OF MEDIA

LD120056 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1830 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Communique of the Portuguese Council of the Revolution read by Council Spokesman Colonel Vitor Alves on 11 September in Lisbon--recorded]

[Text] Our country is currently experiencing a delicate period of its political life in which issues concerning the proper functioning of those institutions which give shape and substance to the democratic regime assume particular sensitivity. On the eve of the elections which will have a decisive influence on the consolidation of the regime and of the democratic institutions, it is necessary to respect those values of freedom and responsibility which have characterized all elections held since 25 April 1974. This was a target of the April revolution which has so far been fully met.

This situation, at a moment when the role of news reporting assumes particular sensitivity, warrants that special attention be devoted to the conduct of the state-owned media, particularly those which have great impact on public opinion.

While it is generally desirable and legitimate to expect from these media unbiased, balanced and independent conduct, the need for strict observance of such principles is, at the present moment, even greater. In addition, it should also be pointed out that the fact that parliament is in recess and that consequently no plenary sittings are being held [words indistinct] must not mean that democracy is left without one of its basic [word indistinct] that is, the control of power by the citizens through their representatives.

In view of these circumstances, the supervisory responsibility of the official bodies--the mass media advisory councils, whose task is, by mandate of the Assembly of the Republic, to effectively control the state-owned media--should be reinforced not only to ensure the independence and impartiality of the media, but also to contribute to the creation of the citizens' trust that the information they are provided is in fact independent from the organs of power and impartial vis-a-vis the political forces and ideological currents involved in the electoral process.

Precisely in this period when doubts are growing and charges are being levelled with regard to the proper functioning of these media--Radiodifusao Portuguesa and Radiotelevisao Portuguesa--and when such doubts and charges are characterized by the seriousness of the issues they raise, which are in many instances prompted by a lack of response on the part of those in charge of these media, one notices that the mass media advisory councils are being prevented from operating due to the deliberate absence of some members, and that the editorial councils are not being treated by the administrative committees as the important bodies which they are in the structure of the democratic system.

[Words indistinct] the situation described above is the subject of great concern to the organs of sovereignty which, as laid down in article 146 of the constitution, are the guarantors of the regular functioning of the democratic institutions. One hopes and trusts, therefore, that the appropriate organs of sovereignty [words indistinct] will act according to their consciences in order to provide the necessary guarantees and to secure the fulfillment of the legal and constitutional provisions which safeguard the impartiality and independence of the state-owned media. This should be done so that the media may, for their part, fulfill the role of forming opinions, reporting news and criticizing, which is fundamental to the building of a democratic system and the expression of a nation of free citizens.

The Council of the Revolution believes that the consolidation of democracy and its future development would be hampered if legitimate doubts were to emerge among the electorate about the impartiality, pluralism and independence of the way the state-owned media raise and deal with issues which in any way have an effect on the electoral conduct of the citizens.

AVANTE! ON IMPLICATIONS OF SOLUTION TO POLISH STRIKE

LD111217 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 4 Sep 80 p 11

[Unattributed commentary: "Negotiated Solution in Poland Reflects Problems To Be Surmounted"]

[Text] After some 2 weeks, the strike movement in Poland has ended.

In broad outlines, the agreement reached involves measures of an economic and social nature: gradual wage increases (following, moreover, the increases which since 1 July have benefited about 5 million workers); better food supplies to the domestic market, dependent on an increase in agricultural production, while in the meantime exports of livestock products are restricted and meat prices frozen until October 1981; a greater number of places in creches, and other measures of a social nature.

The agreed measures entail a redoubled effort to increase productivity and also to make up for arrears in economic plans which the strike movement caused.

The agreement signed by the government and the Gdansk strike committee has far-reaching implications in the trade union field and of a more general nature.

An initial draft of a new trade union law, prepared by a working group set up by the Central Council of Trade Unions and comprising scientists, trade union members and other representatives of the workers in the enterprises, has been formulated. This initial draft will be subject to redrafting by a group of experts. Once the work has been completed, the bill will be presented to the Central Council of Trade Unions plenum and, before finally being approved in parliament, will be submitted to broad popular debate in the enterprises.

The negotiated solution reflects the nature and depth of the crisis. The leading role of the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] is recognized in the agreement, but at the same time new forms are introduced into Poland's trade union organization which represent a break with practice already proven inthe socialist system.

Similarly, the new forms introduced into the trade union movement involve new aspects which represent a substantial change in the very organization of the Polish socialist state.

Exultant about the crisis in Poland, which, of course, they strove as far as possible to aggravate, the various sectors of the world bourgeoisie could not help taking the opportunity to expatiate on the "bankruptcy" of socialism. In fact, external and internal antisocialist elements sought to intensify and prolong the crisis so as to check the socialist system itself.

The working class of the entire world is following the course of events in Poland expectantly, and is confident that the Polish people will be able to find the correct solutions to the present crisis.

The events were caused by grave mistakes, and matters have been aggravated by the propaganda of imperialism, which wishes to destroy socialist Poland's social gains.

A few days before the resolution of the crisis, the Polish PAP news agency stated that "the social crises which our country is now experiencing have dramatically revealed the weakeness in the functioning of certain mechanisms of political life and, in particular, the need to intensify proletarian democracy." Gdansk PZPR City Committee First Secretary Fiszbach stated that "the strikes were the consequence of the defective functioning of socialist democracy--in particular, within the trade union movement."

In the events in Poland, the "psychological warfare" waged by imperialism intensified. Those who throughout the capitalist world, and also in Portugal, are striving to exacerbate exploitation of the workers and to limit their rights, publicly shed crocodile tears at the fate of the Polish workers. In fact the only "freedom" which they uphold is that of restoring capitalism in the socialist community--a vain desire which, however, channels many efforts and "justifies" all expedients, but one which once more will emerge defeated by socialism's ability to surmount the difficulties of growth and the deviations along a path which is far from being straight.

EAST, WEST ADOPTING STANDS AT CSCE PREPARATORY TALKS

LD111506 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] Madrid--Here is a report from the Palace of Exhibitions and Congresses:

At this morning's session of the second working day of the CSCE preparatory talks, the title for the conference was approved and is as follows: a meeting in Madrid in 1980 of the states taking part in the CSCE convened on the basis of the provisions of the final act relating to the continuity of the conference--preparatory meeting. This long title literally transcribes the one which was official in Belgrade at the previous meeting.

Approving the title, discussion began on the third point of the agenda, the timetable for the main meeting to begin on 11 November in Madrid. Positions are already being set forth and the two predominant tendencies are, logically, formed by Western representatives on the one side and by Eastern representatives on the other. The former, for obvious reasons, prefer the Madrid meeting to be based on the lines of the 1977 Belgrade meeting, while those of the Eastern bloc want the basic document to be the Helsinki final act of 1975.

PAPER CITES PSOE'S GONZALEZ ON CRISES IN PCE, UCD

LD111525 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 5 Sep 80 p 15

[EFE report: "PSE in State of Crisis"]

[Excerpts] Lisbon, 4 September--Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez believes that there is a "Cunhalist temptation, caused by reasons of a structural and short-term nature," in the PCE.

In an interview published today by the Lisbon morning newspaper PORTUGAL HOJE, the leader of the foremost Spanish opposition party maintains that the PCE is "in a state of crisis" as a result, on the one hand, of opting for Eurocommunism and, on the other hand, of its inability to break with the Marxist-Leninist kind of hierarchical internal organization and with Moscow.

With respect to the situation in Spain, the PSOE leader asserted that there is "a very tough internal confrontation" in the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] which is in power--a crisis which is allegedly due to the fact that it is a "fictitious" party, a coalition of diverse forces "whose unifying link lies more in interests than in ideas."

In his opinion, the crisis also stems from the "obvious failure" of the UCD's government experience.

This would explain--he added--the existence of a dynamic within the UCD "which seeks to surmount the situation from a rightwing position."

"No" to Popular Front

After stating that the PSOE's tactics for taking power in the next elections have not yet been defined, Felipe Gonzalez said that the Socialists of Portugal and Spain have the same objective problem: representing a majority blueprint--something which can be achieved by the party on its own or through complementary forces which would guarantee it the remainder of the necessary support.

The PSOE leader rejected the possibility of the formation of popular fronts in Spain and Portugal.

DEFENSE MINISTER NOTES IMPORTANCE OF U.S. REINFORCEMENTS

[Christian Broendum report: "No Decision This Year on U.S. Depots in Denmark"]

[Text] Defense Minister Poul Sogaard expects to receive around the end of the year a proposal from NATO's military leaders, SACEUR, which could form the basis for a Danish decision on the establishment of depots for heavy equipment for U.S. forces. "When it has been determined whether a particular force will be made ready for deployment in Denmark in the event of a war situation, we will reach a political decision on depots, and on the question of whether this force--for example, the U.S. Marine Corps--will be needed in a crisis situation, that is, before the outbreak of war," Poul Sogaard said.

The purpose of building American depots is to make possible the swifter transportation of U.S. forces immediately before or after the outbreak of war. Poul Sogaard admitted that if there is no possibility of swifter reinforcements the Danish defense forces will have to be made considerably more effective, so that the defense forces' "holding time" might be longer.

The question of U.S. reinforcements formed part of U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown's letters to Poul Sogaard in January and May this year. Poul Sogaard has denied that the U.S. Government has demanded that Denmark increase its defense budget as a precondition of reinforcements for Denmark. "If there was no possibility of reinforcements being brought to Denmark, I would greatly question the Danish defense forces. We would have to look at Danish security policy in a completely different light."

While Denmark has not been offered a particular U.S. force as reinforcements, the U.S. Government is exerting pressure to bring about a Norwegian decision on the extent to which Norway wishes to stockpile heavy equipment for the U.S. force earmarked for deployment in Norway. According to RITZAUS BUREAU, the U.S. Government has informed the Norwegian Government that Norway will have to reach a decision soon, if the Americans are to be able to include the spending on materials depots in the 1982 U.S. defense budget. The Americans have asked for a Norwegian decision in the course of the fall. According to RITZAUS BUREAU, the original intention was that the Norwegian Government was going to reach its decision in the spring, but chose instead to appoint a commission to look into the question of materials stockpiling.

The proposal from NATO on reinforcements for Denmark was originally expected at the end of the year, but planning has been somewhat delayed by the Russian invasion of Afghanistan, which has necessitated reappraisals in a number of fields.

FRYDENLUND ADDRESSES LABOR PARTY ON CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING

LD120923 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 8 Sep 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "Frydenlund: 'Stockpiling in Trondelag Will Not Be Seen as a Threat'"]

[Text] The government has decided to go in for contingency stockpiling for allied forces in Trondelag--and for Norwegian forces in northern Norway. Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund announced this at the Labor Party National Executive meeting on Sunday.

"In its overall evaluation of the question the government has arrived at the view that the Trondelag area is the best alternative for the contingency stockpiling of equipment for a brigade of U.S. Marines," the foreign minister said. The reason behind this solution, according to Frydenlund, is that the need for reinforcements would be most pressing in northern Norway and that Norwegian soldiers would be available more quickly than other reinforcements. The stockpiling in the north would be for a combined regiment and would be additional to the national stockpiles already set up in the area. The foreign minister pointed out that the government had based its decision on the following considerations:

1. Norwegian security policy is based on two main principles: the securing of Norwegian territory and reassurance for neighboring countries. By setting up contingency stockpiles in Trondelag we would strengthen Norway's security at the same time as the measure's defensive character would be made so obvious that it would be impossible to claim that it amounts to a threat to other countries.

2. The combination of American contingency stockpiling in Trondelag and Norwegian reinforcement in the north gives greater political freedom of action in crisis situations and also better possibilities for meeting different situations that could arise in connection with Norwegian defense. Frydenlund said that the Americans had expressed their understanding for the political and military views that had determined the Norwegian plan. But as yet no final reaction has been received from the United States.

The further treatment of the matter will be discussions between the authorities involved in the two countries on draft proposals for a final arrangement. The heavy equipment that could be part of the stockpiles for the brigade in question comprises vehicles, artillery and SAM missiles. In addition, a suitable arrangement for plans for the storing of fuel and ammunition must be reached. The government would then be able to reach a decision and present the matter of the storing for its approval. The foreign minister, who stressed that a matter such as this is difficult to deal with openly because it requires confidential negotiations and rests on secret documents, also stressed the following points:

1. I would first like to state that the government has reached its decision on the basis of respect for Norwegian interests. It is not the result of any pressure from outside, from one side or the other.

2. Second, with the direction and the intensity that the debate within Norway has acquired, it would have been indefensible in the government's view to meet the National Executive without a decision on the matter.

3. Third, the government's decision is in accordance with what has been the major line in the Labor Party's security policy throughout the postwar period--and with the storing resolutions that had been adopted.

With the solution the government is advocating, no one can say that Norway is behaving provocatively or is increasing tension in Scandinavia, Frydenlund said, and added: "And finally, the actual arrangement and the possible agreement will be presented to the Norwegian political authorities for approval.

"The matter concerns the limited storing of equipment for Norway's most important allies. The vast majority of the Norwegian people expect help from the Americans if this should turn out to be necessary. This includes Labor Party voters," Frydenlund said.

Frydenlund also mentioned the policies of detente and said in this context: "As far as the possibilities of starting negotiations on nuclear arms in Europe are concerned, I think that they are now real, and that such negotiations will hopefully start in the near future. Brezhnev's recent letter to Prime Minister Nordli and Reiulf Steen, among others, confirms the Soviet Union's willingness to take part in such negotiations. The NATO nations for their part have a clearly worded offer of negotiations in their December resolution of last year," he said.

BRITISH AIRWAYS SUSPENDS FLIGHTS TO IRAN

LD101924 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1627 GMT 10 Sep 80

[By Michal Imeson, PA air correspondent]

[Text] British Airways has suspended its services from London to Tehran for the next seven days--"while local conditions are being reviewed", a spokesman said tonight. This means the cancellation of Boeing 707 flights due to leave London tomorrow, on Friday and next Monday. Instead the 263 passengers booked on BA services will be put on Pakistan International Airways or Iran Air flights.

The airline spokesman said: "This was a British Airways decision." It is understood there was no direction from the Foreign Office. BA still has two Britons at work in Iran, a station officer and an engineer, both based at Tehran Airport.

NABULUS MAYOR MEETS WITH LIBERAL PARTY LEADERS

[Anne Whitehouse report: "Ash-Shak'ah Meets With British Liberal Party Leader"]

[Excerpt] Blackpool-Bassam ash-Shak'ah, the mayor of Nabulus in occupied Palestine, was warmly welcomed by British Liberal Party leader David Steel in their first meeting yesterday.

During the talks, which Ash-Shak'ah described as "positive," David Steel expressed his sympathy with the Palestinian people. He asserted that the British Liberal Party is making active efforts to reach a just solution for the Arab-Israeli problem.

The meeting, which lasted 25 minutes, took place during the first day of the Liberal Party assembly which is being held in Blackpool in northern England. The meeting was attended by Liberal MP Stephen Ross who is one of the Liberal Party's active supporters of Israel. Both he and Steel expressed their admiration for Ash-Shak'ah, who lost both legs in June as a result of an Israeli terrorist bomb in his car. He is now in Britain for treatment.

David Steel and Stephen Ross will be among a six-man Liberal Party delegation that will visit the Middle East within the next 2 weeks. The delegation is scheduled to meet with PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat. The delegation will visit Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Egypt and Israel.

Steel said that during his visit to the occupied territories he will be accompanied by the British consul and will seek to meet with leaders of Palestinian public opinion.

Ash-Shak'ah last night made a speech at the meeting of the friends of Palestine in the Liberal Party. He said in his 45-minute speech:

It gives me great pleasure to address members of the Liberal Party because I believe that the Palestine problem concerns them just as it concerns every person with human conscience and understanding." Bassam Ash-Shak'ah explained to the Liberal Party members at a meeting outside of the party's annual conference the Israeli authorities' arbitrary measures in the occupied territories and the steps by which it is strangling the municipal council of the Palestinian towns.

U.S. PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES' BEHAVIOR SCORED

LD121041 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 12 Sep 80 p 16

[Editorial: "Presidential Antics"]

[Text] America's presidential election campaign has been failing miserably to rise above the "you're another," "yah-boo" level. No one following it from afar--or, in our guess, most Americans either--can possibly get the impression that what is being debated are the big issues for American policies during the next four years of what everyone agrees could be a most dangerous decade. Mr Carter has set the tone by switching his policies around to suit what he judges to be the popular mood. Two examples are the economy and defence. On the economy, he has calmly accepted Senator Kennedy's big-spending plans after having gone hard for a balanced budget. On defence, he has dropped his previous pacifist attitudes and by calculated leaks is pretending to be a re-armer.

At the same time as trying to look a bit tougher on defence, Mr Carter has been running an energetic scare camapign to persuade voters that Mr Reagan would start an unbridled arms race which would lead straight to Armageddon.

Mr. Reagan, for his part, has concentrated largely on the failures and contradictory policies of Mr Carter's presidency--admittedly a rich field but not really calcuated to direct the people's minds forward into the 80's.

In short, neither of the two main candidates give much impression of knowing how they want to lead America in the complicated and difficult years ahead--though for our money Mr Reagan still looks the better bet.

Perhaps the triviality is inevitable, though why it should be thought so is hard to explain. One sighs for a man of stature, not a man on a white horse but merely someone who can articulate the problems which everyone knows face us, and his ideas on how to approach them.

The niggling rat-race in which the candidates are trapped is well illustrated by the haverings over who should appear on the televised "debates" to be staged starting Sept 21. Mr Carter refuses to appear unless it is alone with Mr Reagan. The promoters say Mr Anderson will be there, since he has 15 percent in the latest polls. Mr Reagan is agreeable to that, since he knows Mr Anderson will take votes away from Mr Carter rather than himself.

This is a television-dominated age, as we all know, nowhere more so than in the United States. But this kind of jockeying is surely deplorable. If Mr Carter persists in school-boyish calculations of this kind he forfeits his assets and may well suffer for that at the polls come November.

DENKTAS REAFFIRMS LOYALTY TO TURKEY AFTER MILITARY TAKEOVER

TA121146 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] In a message sent to Gen Kenan Evren, chief of the general staff and president of the National Security Council, President Rauf Denktas hoped that the historic decision of the Turkish Armed Forces would be auspicious for the nation. President Denktas also reaffirmed the Turkish Cypriot community's loyalty to motherland Turkey.

Meanwhile, the Council of Ministers of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus held an extraordinary meeting under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay at 1100 today. The council of Ministers discussed the recent developments. Today the Turkish Airlines plane took off as usual for Istanbul with 11 passengers.

PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU RESPONDS TO CRITICISM OF RESHUFFLE

NC120906 Nicosia Public Information Office in English 11 Sep 80 p 1

[Text of statement by President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou in Nicosia 11 Sep]

[Text] The establishment or reshuffle of the government is constitutionally an inalienable right of the president of the republic. Every party and every citizen are of course free to express their views, but it cannot be disputed that it would have been wiser if everybody had waited to see in practice the performance and work of the new government before expressing any views. Instead of doing this some made haste to characterize the government as weaker than the previous and as an unsuitable government. Personally I have absolute confidence in the competence of the new ministers and the ability of the government to render great services to the country.

It is really strange that on the occasion of the government reshuffle parties have thought fit to attack the president of the republic once more. They talk of "a host of mistakes" on the part of the president without taking into consideration the objective internal difficulties or the exogenous factors which have adverse effects on the various fields of public life in Cyprus. But this is not the moment to deal with this. I intend to deal at length, at the right moment, with the various matters related to the various fields of public life. Still more strange is the fact that these parties link the government reshuffle to the Cyprus problem and the line to be followed. Indicative of this strange situation is that while the AKEL leadership represents me as disagreeing with the Makarios line laid down in 1977 and as pursuing, together with the archbishop and the EDEK leadership, a line other than the Makarios line leading at best, to double enosis, and, at worse, to complete enslavement of Cyprus to Turkey, the EDEK leadership claims that "the yielding line of the rally and the policy of concessions followed by AKEL are graduadlly becoming the policy of the president of the republic, who is giving in to the pressures of these two parties as proved by the acceptance of the latest Waldeim formula..."

Both the allegation of AKEL and the claim of EDEK are untenable. The AKEL leadership has for quite some time now been trying to convince the people that I am not following the Makarios line. It is high time the AKEL leadership made clear to the people what it actually means when it talks of the Makarios line. For if the AKEL leadership means the four guidelines, that is the Makarios-Denktas agreement, I fully adopted them and they are included in the agreement I reached with Mr Denktas on 19 May, 1979. If, on the other hand, it means the Makarios proposals submitted in 1977, again it is known that I adopted them regardless of any initial disagreement on my part, and, when I adopt something I support it consciously and with consistency.

Regarding the allegation about a yielding attitude put forward by EDEK, we have made absolutely no retreat by accepting the resumption of the talks because everything will be discussed at the negotiating table on the basis of the top level agreements.

I am fully aware of my responsibilities to the country and to the people, and I know very well what is in their interests. I subscribe neither to extremism nor to yielding attitudes. I have been handling the national issue with prudence, a sense of responsibility and firmness, and the National Council is kept informed regarding the taking of decisions on the handlings. Indeed it is my intention that the National Council should be convened more often, particularly during the talks, which will start on September 16, that is in a few days.

The AKEL leadership has chosen this moment, on the eve of the resumption of the talks, to say that "what Cyprus needs today is a president believing in, and consistently implementing, the Makarios line." This statement no doubt gladdens the Turkish side.

I know and I am following the Makarios line, but it is high time an end was put to the exploitation of the Makarios line for reasons having nothing to do with the Makarios line or Makarios. Makarios belongs to history. Makarios has left us as heritage his patriotism, his own contribution and the dictate to solve the Cyprus problem in a nationally acceptable manner.

Instead of Makarios and his line being continuously exploited, each party must analyse the substance of its views or at least interpret the line it claims it is following. For example, they must explain to the refugees and the people their position on the question of the problem. When they do this, both the people will be enlightened and a truly constructive dialogue will start in the place of vague talk.

And since I have been following the Makarios line as he himself defined it, what kind of president would AKEL want and to do what? To be amenable to pressures and to give in in the face of difficulties or to interpret the Makarios line according to circumstances or to follow a policy of concessions?

I am really sorry that I have to exercise the right of defense and today I confine myself only [to] doing this. For the people must start doing some sound thinking. Neither undermining nor accusations will force me to follow a policy in which I do not believe but I will continue to follow the policy of prudence and determination and I repeat I know very well what the Makarios line was and also his thoughts. I was an associate of his for 30 years.

As regards the [Democratic] Rally party, which has for almost two years now been pretending to be interested in a reshuffle, it was certain in advance that it would find the new government weaker than the previous, and this was taken for granted by its mouthpieces beforehand. The Rally's attitude is permanently negative in everything. Known is its position that the president must follow a yielding and class policy.

It is not my intention to reply in detail to the statement of the outgoing minister of education because this is an indecent text the contents of which show the character of the man. He demagogically invokes Makarios, attacks the president and the government for a host of mistakes which almost ruined the state, as he claims, and insults a government of which he was a member until the day before yesterday. If this is how Mr. Sofianos felt he should have resigned long ago and dissociated himself from the government. I gave Mr. Sofianos a lot of time to behave as a responsible member of the government and to give up his demagogic and factional tactics. As Mr. Sofianos himself knows, he is the last person to have the right to barricade himself behind Makarios and to exploit his name.

There should at long last be some respect for a great leader such as Ethnarch Makarios. When there is reference to his name, this must be done with reverence and in a manner befitting a man who dedicated his whole life to serving his country and graced by his deeds the history of our country. He should not become an object of exploitation for political or partisan expediences of any kind.

I would have a lot to say. But today I confine myself to this only. If need be I shall revert. What I would like to point out is that there is a need for composure, tranquillity and concord at a time when we are entering the intercommunal talks to which we very rightly attach particular importance and on the outcome of which the further course of our national issue and the future of our country will depend.

AKEL WITHDRAWS SUPPORT FOR GOVERNMENT

NC111110 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 11 Sep 80 P 1

[AKEL Central Committee Politburo 10 September statement on the Council of Ministers reshuffle]

[Text] After prolonged efforts Mr Spiros Kiprianou announced the new Council of Ministers at midnight. After scores of persons--including former ministers in the Makarios government--who had been approached, declined to participate in the government, Kiprianou arrived at a rough reshuffle which now has a composition much worse than the former Council of Ministers. Mr Spiros Kiprianou, who exhausts himself over unity, has never given importance to the dire need for a strong representative government which, based on the Makarios line, would tackle both the Cyprus issue and the voluminous other problems created due to his inability and incorrect policy in a responsible manner.

Mr Spiros Kiprianou was elected president of the republic in February 1978 on the basis of an electorate program that happened to have the general approval of the parties. However, in the 2 and 1/2 years that have passed, he succeeded in splintering the domestic front and creating conditions of political and economic crisis.

In the Cyprus issue Kiprianou spent all this time in aimless discussions on similar formulas, which are no different in substance from the formula that he had ultimately accepted. This is because in 1977 he disagreed with Makarios' line for solving the Cyprus issue and until this day he still disagrees. Because together with the Archbishop [Khrisostomos] and the Edek leadership they align themselves with a line other than the Makarios line which leads at best to double enosis and at worst to Cyprus' total enslavement to Turkey.

In the economic sphere Mr Kiprianou has failed to take any measures to face the problems with the result that the economic rise which he took over from Makarios, changed into decline with the danger of deeper crisis and unemployment. As a result of his mishandling he succeeded in pushing teachers, civil servants and other working groups into strikes. Elementary schools and high schools closed for long periods. He succeeded in paralyzing the state machinery with the result that a great many problems concerning refugees, farmers and other worker groups remain unsolved and the people's indignation is at its peak.

Mr Kiprianou has trampled upon and violated his promises in his policy statement at the time when he was seeking the support of the parties and the people. Today Mr Kiprianou does not enjoy the confidence of the people's majority, precisely because he has deceived them and has violated their mandate.

AKEL has disassociated itself from the president and his government since last May. Because of the fact that the new ministers do not represent anyone and because Kiprianou continues to make mistakes, today AKEL definitely withdraws its support to the government, which AKEL considers incapable of solving the Cyprus issue and the very serious and manifold problems of the people.

AKEL maintains that what Cyprus needs today is a president who believes and with consistency implements the Makarios line as well as a truly representative political government that on the basis of this line would undertake to solve the Cyprus issue and the other serious problems of the country.

AKEL will cooperate with all those patriotic democratic forces which agree with this position and which will mobilize the people for Cyprus' salvation and liberation.

I SIMERINI CLAIMS HOUSE PRESIDENT TO FORM NEW PARTY

NC060804 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 6 Sep 80 pp 1, 8

[Excerpts] Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis, president of the House of Representatives and deputy chairman of DIKO [Democratic Front Party], has circulated a political manifesto for the formation of a new party. According to our information, the manifesto sets as its primary target the collection of 50 signatures and the formation, at a second stage, of a 150-member body which will constitute the nucleus of a political party. The manifesto has been sent to various persons both inside and outside DIKO. When this information was brought to the attention of Mr Stavros Ambizas, the party parliamentary spokesman, he stated that he did not know that such a manifesto had been circulated.

In the meantime, yesterday was regarded as a critical day for the developments within DIKO because President Kiprianou was to have his first meeting with the leadership of PEK [Pan-Agrarian Union of Cyprus] after four DIKO deputies, who support the agrarian organization, had expressed their intention to secede from the party.

At 1800 yesterday, the political bureau of DIKO held a meeting which lasted 3 hours. DIKO leading members have denied that it was an emergency meeting and stated it was a regular meeting of the political bureau which does not convene on a fixed day.

At this meeting, according to our information, President Kiprianou briefed the members of the political bureau on his meeting with the PEK leaders. The political bureau meeting also dealt with organizational matters.

A party statement, issued after the meeting, says among other things: The political bureau has once again declared its irrevocable decision to promote the targets and aims of DIKO, particularly during the present critical times Cyprus is passing through, in serving, basically, the national issue and the people's interests regardless of any difficulties or obstacles which the party will confront with faith and determination. For this purpose, it calls on the people to strengthen DIKO's ranks with the certainty that they serve their country.

According to the statement, the meeting also discussed the question of the electoral lists.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL ISSUES COMMUNIQUES AFTER COUP

Armed Forces Takeover

TA120523 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0418 GMT 12 Sep 80

[National Security Council Communique No 1]

[Text] The lofty Turkish nation: As we have observed in recent years, the Turkish Republic--which was entrusted to us by the great Ataturk as a territorial and national entity--is facing treacherous ideological and physical attacks against its existence, its political system and its independence through the provocation of external and internal enemies.

The state and its principal organs have been rendered inoperative, the constitutional organizations have become full of contradictions or silent and through their fruitless arguments and intransigent attitudes the political parties have failed to secure the unity and togetherness needed to save the country and have no taken the necessary measures. Thus the destructive and secessionist sources have increased their activities to the utmost and the protection of life and property of the citizens was threatened. Reactionary and other deviationist ideologies flourished instead of Ataturkism, and the educational institutions--from elementary schools to universities--the administration, the judicial organs, the internal security organization, the labor organizations, the political parties and finally even our citizens in the most isolated part of the country were oppressed by attacks and pressures in a sysmtematic and treacherous manner and were driven to the verge of secessionism and civil war. In short, the state was left powerless and rendered impotent.

The great Turkish nation: It is under this atmosphere that the Turkish Armed Forces have decided to discharge the duty--accorded by the internal service law--of protecting and defending the Turkish Republic on behalf of the lofty Turkish nation within the framework of order and command and has totally seized the administration of the country.

This operation aims to maintain the integrity of the country, ensure the national unity and togetherness, prevent a possible civil war and war among brothers, restore the authority and existence of the state, and eliminate the reasons hindering the functioning of the democratic system. The parliament and the government have been abolished. The immunity of the members of parliament have been annulled. Martial law has been declared throughout the country. All travels abroad have been banned. A curfew has been imposed as of 0500 until further notice in a bid to quickly ensure the life and property of the citizens.

A detailed announcement regarding this operation of protecting and defending the republic will be broadcast by myself on the radio and television at 1300 today. I expect the citizens to follow the statements to be announced by the radio and the television, to fully comply with them and to trust the Turkish Armed Forces, which are part of them.

[Signed] Gen Kenan Evren, chief of staff and National Security Council president.

Message to Military

[National Security Council Communique No 6]

[Text] My valiant colleagues in arms: In view of the vitally serious threat with which the integrity and the national unity and solidarity of the Turkish Republic was confronted, the Turkish Armed Forces have seized the administration and have established full and firm control throughout the country within a short time--by fulfilling the historic task which fell upon them under their internal service statute, and in a manner which was hoped for and earnestly expected by the majority of the nation and inspired by a high sense of discipline, boundless patriotism and conscious determination and dignity.

Had the armed forces failed to make such a historic decision, at this time when our national existence was threatened by countless crises created by economic, social and political problems, the great Ataturk's sacred legacy and principles would have been subjugated under corrupt ideologies, and the Turkish Armed Forces--despite their traditional and boundless loyalty to their country and their unique heroism and sacrifice--would have borne a heavy responsibility for this catastrophe before their glorious history and before the nation.

Dear colleagues in arms: In addition to your services, which you are performing with supreme effort and unselfishly, I also entrust you with the historic and honorable task of waging a struggle against anarchy, terrorism and division, and against communist, fascist and fanatical religious ideologies, with a view to securing the happiness and prosperity of the great Turkish nation; and I am fully confident that you will succeed in this task. You will derive your strength from the noble Turkish nation's loyal affection for and trust in you, from the noble and patriotic blood in your veins, and from Ataturk's principles which you have pledged to uphold forever along with your flag.

In times when our country is faced with serious danger and crisis, your supreme efforts and sacrifices divorced from selfish interests, your high sense of discipline, your will for boundless effort and achievement and your conscious passion to serve--all of which the nation has always been aware and appreciates--represent the fulfillment of a most sacred ideal which will forever guide the Turkish Republic in conformity with Ataturk's principles.

I request of the Turkish Armed Forces, today as in the past also, to fulfill the orders they will receive within the chain of command with a supreme sense of discipline and patriotism and with supreme enthusiasm, to react in a mature and calm manner to all provocative acts, to refrain from any statement and action likely to damage our great nation's respect for them and to remain always vigilant and alert against domestic and foreign threats.

[Signed] Gen Kenan Evren, chief of the general staff and National Security Council president.

CHIEF OF STAFF EVREN OUTLINES POLICY OF NEW REGIME

TA121236 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Speech by Gen Kenan Evren, chief of the Turkish General Staff and National Security Council president; time and place not given--live or recorded]

[Text] To the lofty Turkish nation: In my address to you on the occasion of 30 August victory day--during the limited time that was alloted to me--I tried to explain to you as much as possible through radio and television the political and economic situation in our country as well as the necessary measures against the anarchic and devisive incidents. It should again be recalled that during the last 2 years, on each and every occasion, while addressing you on the radio and television I have pointed out those vital issues. I believe that all patriotic citizens with common sense will agree with me that the vital political, economic and social issues that our country is currently experiencing have reached a dimension that threatens the survival of our state and people, resulting in the worst crisis our country has experienced since the establishment of the republic. Moreover, as it was clear to everyone, divisive, anarchic and violent incidents have claimed the lives of about 20 citizens every day.

Turkish citizens who share the same religious and national values have been divided into several camps through partisanship and concocted divisiveness and have been incited to kill each other pitilessly as if they were enemies. Ten years ago, who would have thought that our republic founded on the principles of Ataturk would be brought to this state.

Promises by various governments that came to power that resolutions and measures that would insure domestic security would be urgently taken in a bid to combat civil war [ozel harp]—numerous examples of which are cited in the history of the world--which was being intensified by each passing year, and its penetrating and devastating effects were forgotten through clashes of political interests, petty partisanship, whimsical stands, illusions, unreasonable demands and overt and covert aspirations which are not compatible with the nature of the Turkish state.

While the dimensions of the incidents of anarchy and violence employing hostile methods and goals necessitated special legislative measures, administrative reorganizations, the promotion of social conditions and the rearrangement of the national education and business life, the deputies and senators who were charged with representing the nation have remained bystanders to these developments in the Grand National Assembly for months for the sake of their party's interests and discipline. All measures taken by the governments in power with the hope of settling the problems were denounced by the opposition parties and were undermined even in cases in which these measures were in the interest of the country. Even in periods in which national unity and solidarity were most necessary, polarizations and divisions were almost encouraged. Instead of trying to put out the fire altogether, more fuel was poured on the flames and the country was transformed into an inferno on purpose or for partisan interests in a bid to assume power.

The term, state of law, which they kept talking about was interpreted by certain constitutional institutions as the protection of individuals, even if this meant the disruption of the state, and the state and the nation were left without any protection.

The multifaceted authorities provided by the constitution were, in practice, transformed into conflicting authorities. While subversive incidents incited by both domestic and foreign sources were affecting our religion, our thoughts and all other fields, it is sad that those who asked for an imaginary autonomy, those who believed in a scientific solution [bilimserlik]--which did not convince anyone--and those who called for complete legislative actions, without taking the conditions into consideration, were not aware that they would be left under the debris of the state that they would cause to collapse and would be destroyed.

It has been impossible to hear the voice of those who saw these bitter realities and who sought remedies or of those who warned the Turkish nation and called it to unite. I would like to express my gratitude to a certain section of the valuable Turkish press which, from time to time, have issued warnings. In this critical period, rather than taking the measures for which the people were impatiently waiting, the political parties have preferred preparing the ground, for election purposes, by continuously increasing the internal tension, by inciting the destructive and secessionist sources and by making statements that encourage them.

By filling all the levels of the state organization with persons sharing their political views, the political parties that assumed power forced the civil servants and the citizens to take sides and form camps and did not renounce their partisan attitude and stand. This caused the formation of sources supporting anarchy and secessionism and of opposing camps among civil servants and even among the police and the teachers.

Thus, our impartial people were forced to seek from the political parties what they expect from the state. The state authority was thus condemned to disappear and, rather than protect the rights and laws of the citizens and offer them impartial service, the prestige of the state was condemned to slowly vanish. Subsequently, a total vacuum of authority was created in our country.

Certain unfortunate people were able to overtly display disrespect for our national anthem --which symbolizes the independence, the unity and national solidarity of the Turkish nation--through extreme fanaticism or deviationist ideological aims by sitting down in protest or singing the Internationale. The persons who were directly responsible for this were able to defend themselves by resorting to semantics.

As will be recalled, the Turkish Armed Forces, which have been closely observing these extremely regrettable events for some time, had warned all the constitutional organizations, which were unable to exercise the authority granted to them by the nation and which were impotent in the face of this terrible course of events, through our president and had also included in this warning the measures that should be taken. Despite the numerous warnings we issued during the past 8 months, the legislative and executive organs did not give an adequate reply and were not observed to act positively with regard to most of these measures.

Since 22 March 1980, our assemblies, which passed some ineffective laws following this letter of warning, have wasted time. This constitutes the most important aspect of the struggle against the current crisis resulting from the impasse in the election of a president due to political calculations. In no country in the world have the office of the president and the election of a president been taken so lightly, and never was so much time wasted over these issues.

Our legal organs, which are expected to solve the public order issue and the economic crisis and to enact laws, have remained indifferent in the face of this nightmare that descended upon the country.

Despite the fact that our constitution clearly states that Turkish citizens cannot be criticized because of their religious beliefs, our political parties--which are pursuing only one scheme--have considered it beneficial to incite sectarian differences--which were forgotten during the term of the republic of the lofty Ataturk--and have incited our citizens to massacre each other for the sake of political interests. It has been forgotten that all who live within the borders of the Turkish Republic and who consider themselves Turkish citizens form the Turkish nation as one body. Provokers who want to prevent the fraternal unity of our citizens belonging to different sects have received political support.

Instead of pursuing an impartial, just and joint course in the face of anarchy, terrorism and secessionism, certain constitutional organizations have--under various influences--opted to remain silent, even in the face of the violation of the constitution itself.

Our constitutional institutions, whose duty is to safeguard the basic principles of a state of law, despite the prevailing conditions, tried to conceal the fact that the state was faced with destruction through a dynamite explosion placed at its base either because they could not realize the dimension of the threat caused by the anarchy at the highest echelons of the state or because they were intimidated by the sources of terror. The fact that all the judicial institutions, which are under the protective wings of the constitution, and all autonomous educational institutions and associations would be crushed under the debris in the event of the destruction of the state was forgotten.

Terror has claimed 5,241 lives in the last 2 years. During the war of independence, 5,713 persons were killed and 18,480 were wounded in the battle of Sakarya. Even a simple comparison clearly reveals that an undeclared war, which has no regard for human feelings is being fought in Turkey.

Dear citizens, it is because of all these reasons and because of other similar reasons with which you are well acquainted that the Turkish Armed Forces was forced to take over the state administration with the aim of safeguarding the unity of the country and the nation and the rights and freedoms of the people, insuring the security of life and property and the happiness and prosperity of the people, insuring the prevalence of law and order, in other words, restoring the state authority in an impartial manner.

As of today, legislative and executive authority will be employed by the National Security Council-composed of the ground, air and naval forces commanders and the commander of the gendarmerie--under my leadership until a new government and legislative organ is formed. I believe in the necessity of raising our national culture above the contemporary level of civilization, as stated by Ataturk, securing the most modern and developed equipment and resources and realizing as soon as possible a period of speedy development.

We have no doubt that our lofty nation will trust the administration of the Turkish Armed Forces, which pursues the Ataturk principles and which is impartial in the face of the polarization in our country, to fulfill these beliefs. We have confidence in the lofty Turkish nation and we expect the nation to demonstrate a work pace that will reveal the whole of our power and force and to enter, in solidarity, into a disciplined and economically oriented atmosphere. I believe that all the threats directed against our nation will be thwarted by uniting our citizens around a national conscience and ideals which share the same destiny, happiness and griefs--a prerequisite for securing domestic peace and tranquillity--through inspiration from the nationalism of Ataturk, through loyalty to the peace at home, peace in the world principle and by developing the spirit of national struggle and loyalty to the Ataturk principles and reforms.

The Turkish Republic is determined to develop its economic, social and cultural relations with all countries, especially with our neighbors, based on principles of mutual independence and respect, under conditins of equality and of not interfering in the internal affairs of each other and remaining loyal to all alliances and agreements, including NATO. It will continue to follow a foreign policy in favor of solving international problems through peaceful means.

The Turkish Armed Forces, which have through their stands on numerous occasions proved their faith in the democratic and free parliamentary system, will as soon as possible establish the Council of Ministers and will leave the responsibility of administration to this council. Following the completion of a constitution, an election law and a political parties law--which benefits the Turkish nation and which will prevent its degeneration, as occurred, and the blocking of the free and democratic parliamentary system--and following arrangements in parallel with these, the Turkish Armed Forces will hand over the governing of the country to an administration. It will respect human rights and freedoms, give priority to national solidarity, implement social justice, attach importance to the tranquillity, security and well being of the individual and the society and which is based on the free, democratic, secular and social justice laws.

Until these arrangements are completed, all kinds of political activities in our country have been stopped at every level. The political parties, the activities of which have been stopped as a necessity, will be allowed to engage sufficiently in activities prior to the elections, the time and conditions of which will be announced in accordance with the new stipulations in the constitution and with the new law on elections and political parties.

Members of the parliament will not be considered guilty because of their political activities and, as long as they do not commit acts and adopt stands contrary to the new administration, no action will be taken against them. However, the necessary investigation will be made of legislators who have previously committed illegal acts.

The leaders of the JP, the RPP, the NSP and the NAP are, for the time being, confined to reside in specified places under the protection and supervision of the Turkish Armed Forces in order to insure their security of life. They will be released when the situation is suitable.

It will be ensured that the administration will serve citizens in a totally impartial manner. The functioning of civil servants outside political influences will be ensured by law. At this moment when the Turkish Armed Forces have seized the administration, administrators who will give impartial and just service on the side of the state will continue their service and duties as long as they do not revert to the political attitudes of the past. Legal and administrative measures will be taken to ensure that the courts--comprised of experienced and skillful persons able to insure the prevalance of law and order--make speedy and correct decisions and fearlessly implement them.

All kinds of efforts will be made in all fields in a bid to improve the economic situation of our country with our own means. All rights of the hard working and patriotic Turkish workers--within the framework of the present economic conditions--will be safeguarded. However, we shall ban the activities of certain masters [aga] who exploit the honest Turkish workers, who resort to all kinds of pressures in a bid to use them to further their own ideologies and who are concerned about their interests rather than the rights of the workers. All necessary measures will be taken so that all employers will be helpful in increasing production and exports without departing from conditions that insure labor peace.

Special imprtance will be given to implementing an agricultural mobilization and price policy that will permit the increase of agricultural produce and that will make the motto, the peasant is our master, come true. A solution will be sought to economic and social problems which are forcing an influx of peasants from the villages to the cities.

Measures that will spread the nationalism of Ataturk through proper education and culture will be taken as soon as possible, measures that will prevent our children, who are our future security, from becoming influenced by foreign ideologies--instead of Ataturk's principles--and from becoming anachists. To this end the division of our most esteemed teachers by being registered with leftist or rightist associations will be prevented. The goal of all education will be learning skills and knowledge--under Ataturk's principles and nationalism--in a bid to increase production.

All the personnel of the Turkish Armed Forces--from the simple private to the officer with the highest rank--shall be the preventive and protective arm of the state in future efforts to reach these goals, but without being involved in politics.

Dear citizens, I would like to reiterate that the Turkish Armed Forces have been forced to seize power in order to insure the rightful prosperity and happiness of the Turkish nation, to provide for the unity of the country and the people, to enhance the Ataturk principles--which have been neglected lately--to place the democratic system--which was prevented from functioning--on a strong basis and to restore the state authority that had disappeared.

We--commanders, officers, NCOs and soldiers of the Turkish Armed Forces--are all ready to sacrifice everything, including our lives, for the sake of the prosperity and happiness of the country and the nation. Some ill-intentioned persons and associations--whose number has increased lately--might try to tell you the contrary through lies and might resort to negative propaganda. Do not ever believe them. All implementations will be carried out in the open and before the eyes of the nation.

Dear citizens, any resistance, demonstration or stand against the Turkish Armed Forces--which are an inseparable and loyal part of the nation--or the new administration will be strictly and instantly broken up and punished. I am calling on all our citizens not to heed provocations--so that bloodshed can be prevented in the country--to act peacefully in line with communiques being published and not to go out into the street until further notice. I am also calling on them to be respectful of each others rights and to forget their disputes with affection and to be helpful to the new administration with the awareness that we are all Turkish citizens with equal rights, living on this sacred land. I expect this of the Turkish citizen's patriotic and noble character and wish them a happy and bright future.

TCP REACTS TO COUP, URGES CONTINUED STRUGGLE

[Text] Dear listeners, the military junta headed by Chief of Staff Evren toppled the government and dissolved the parliament early this morning. What is the situation at this moment? As its first action the junta banned all the political parties in the country, including the democratic parties. It attacked the unions as well as the progressive organizations. The Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions--the syndical organizations of hundreds of thousands of workers--has been closed down and its leaders were arrested.

The news that the junta seized the administration was first announced to the world by the U.S. Secretary of State. The commander of the NATO southeastern flank striking force arrived in Ankara 1 day prior to the coup. All these facts show that pro-American and pro-NATO generals have seized the administration in our country and engaged in an attack against the democratic forces and primarily against the working class. The democratic forces will avert this attack. The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] is standing upright. The ties among the members of the TCP, the RPP, the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Socialist Workers Party and members of the NSP who are opposed to the Americans and the slavery agreements should be strengthened. Nothing has ended with the coup. This is not the first time our people and our working class are faced with such attacks. Therefore they will not be panicked or intimidated. They will continue their resistance in a cool-headed and courageous manner in accordance with the new conditions. No tyranny or dictatorship can break the anti-imperialist struggle of the working class and the democratic forces.

BELGIUM REPORTEDLY WITHDRAWS FROM NATO MANEUVERS IN TURKEY

NC141818 Paris AFP in English 1810 GMT 14 Sep 80

[Text] Brussels, 14 Sep (AFP)--Belgium has decided to withdraw from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) "Anvil Express" maneuvers underway in Turkey "because that country is now a military dictatorship," an informed source said here today.

The source said that the Belgian Government's decision was announced yesterday to the NATO Council at a special session devoted to the situation created by the military coup in Turkey. The maneuvers are scheduled to continue until October 6.

The source said that the Belgian stand was announced at the second session yesterday of NATO ambassadors, who were also told that Brussels hoped that other NATO members would take the same position to avoid an embarrassing situation.

According to the source,the West German and British delegates argued that the exercises should be continued so that NATO solidarity would not be harmed. The Norwegian and Danish ambassadors also expressed doubts about continuing the maneuvers, the source added, but finally accepted the West German argument.

Diplomatic circles here described the Belgian decision as "disastrous," especially after Brussels refused to participate in major military maneuvers now underway in West Germany.

Belgium has also refused to deploy 48 cruise missiles as part of a plan adopted by NATO last December under which 572 of the weapons are to be installed in Europe between 1983 and 1987.

The United States, Britain, Italy and West Germany are participating in "Anvil Express." Belgium had been scheduled to send a paratroop battalion.

SCHMIDT CABLES BREZHNEV ON DISARMAMENT; TO VISIT U.S.

LD141240 Hamburg DPA in German 1135 GMT 14 Sep 80

[Text] Hamburg/Frankfurt, 14 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has sent another letter to Soviet party leader Leonid Brezhnev in which he comments on disarmament issues. This is reported by the SPD election campaign newspaper ZEITUNG AM SONNTAG. In the latest edition of the election paper, Schmidt also announced that he will visit the United States shortly after the Bundestag elections.

Nothing was said in Bonn about the contents of the new letter to Brezhnev. According to an SPD election campaign paper interview with Schmidt he said that the letter to Brezhnev--a letter replying to the Soviet party leader--was primarily intended "to take us a bit further on the question of disarmament, which is vital for us all."

The federal chancellor said that in the course of his visit to New York he would receive an award from the humanitarian organization "Society of Men" on 19 or 20 November. He said that he would doubtless have an opportunity "to see either the reelected or the newly elected American president." The chancellor underlined that in further talks with the U.S. President he naturally wanted to help to continue and deepen the dialogue between the United States and the Soviet Union. "Only then will we progress on questions of arms limitation, arms control and disarmament."

GENSCHER, GROMYKO EXCHANGE GREETINGS MESSAGES

LD121524 Hamburg DPA in German 1403 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 12 Sep (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and his Soviet counterpart Gromyko today recalled the establishment of diplomatic relations between Bonn and Moscow 25 years ago. In greetings messages the two ministers also underlined the signing of the German-Soviet treaty of 12 August 1970 as an event of outstanding importance for the further development of relations. According to Genscher the Federal Government's wish is to be able to continue along the path embarked upon in a world characterized by the liquidation of conflicts, the consolidation of international security on the basis of equality and parity, and the development of constructive cooperation. Gromyko voiced the hope that German-Soviet relations would continue to develop and deepen fruitfully on the basis of the existing treaties for the good of the peoples of both states and in the interest of the consolidation of peace in Europe and throughout the world.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON MILITARY TAKEOVER IN TURKEY

LD121739 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1700 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said at an election campaign meeting in Karlsruhe that he hopes a normal situation will soon be restored in Turkey. The principle of non-interference also applies to Turkey. Federal Foreign Minister Genscher, FDP, said that the West should be able to expect that Turkey will live up to its alliance commitments. This includes not only the military sector but also the concept of respect for democratic values.

Schmidt Promise of Continued Aid

LD131212 Hamburg DPA in German 1121 GMT 13 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Braunschweig, 13 Sep (DPA)--According to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the Federal Republic will continue to give aid to Turkey, since it is a question--as in Poland--of helping the people, not the government. Speaking at the SPD election rally in Braunschweig today at which, according to police estimates, about 8,000 people were present, Schmidt said he hoped the Turkish authorities would ensure a return to democracy as soon as possible.

Genscher Remarks

[Text] Bonn, 14 Sep (DPA)--Speaking on Hesse Radio today, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said that the question of further economic and financial aid to Turkey following the military coup would be discussed with the allies and partners in the EC and NATO. Genscher expressly warned against hasty steps which could have the effect of making what had been achieved so far go up in a puff of smoke.

Nobody could make a final judgment yet about the aims of the changes undertaken by the military, "but we as allies expect those who now hold power to restore democratic conditions as soon as possible," the foreign minister noted. He also said that he then expected the democratic politicians to show determination "to demonstrate convincingly the ability of a democratic Turkey to act."

Finance Minister on Economic Help

DW150748 Bonn ARD Television Network in German 2030 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] [Matthoefer] International efforts have produced a guarantee for a $3 billion [Turkish] balance of payments deficit. We Germans have taken over somewhat less than one-tenth of this. Of this DM560 million, everything with the exception of DM130 million was paid this spring. We wanted to help in the spring so as to aid agricultural fieldwork and get industry going a bit in order to fight unemployment. We still need to pay DM130 million in project assistance. It will be paid along with the completion of a major project, a powerplant.

We have time to consider whether payments will continue, but we have never disrupted projects in comparable cases. We always complete projects; we never let ruins stand there. We have never done that when it comes to development help and we will probably not do it this time either.

As institutional matters stand in Turkey, the democratic politicians and the military together must find a solution for the enormously difficult problems of that country. I was very shocked when I heared over the radio that democratic politicians had been arrested, particularly Mr Ecevit, the prime minister and leader of the Republican People's Party. I consider that a very grave sign, and I just hope that this will be reversed as quickly as possible.

FRG TO PROVIDE ZAIRE WITH DM65 MILLION IN AID

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--The Federal Government is providing the African Republic of Zaire this year with DM65 million in development aid and DM20 million as part of technical cooperation. At the end of a meeting of several days of the German-Zaire commission in Bonn, the Foreign Ministry in Bonn said Friday that agreement had been reached concerning several concrete projects in the inland shipping, coffee plantation, road building, timber and communications sectors, as well as for a development bank.

On the sideline of the commission's meeting, Zaire's Foreign Minister Inonga Lokonga Lowe had talks with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Development Minister Rainer Offergeld and Secretary of State Dieter von Wuerzen of the Economics Ministry.

STRAUSS ATTACKS SCHIMDT IN DORTMUND SPEECH

LD141717 Hamburg DPA in German 1549 GMT 14 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Dortmund, 14 Sep--The CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship, Franz Josef Strauss, has given a pledge for peace in freedom in the event of a CDU/CSU election victory on 5 October. At a key CDU/CSU election rally before 18,000 people in the packed Westfalenhalle in Dortmund this afternoon, Strauss proclaimed: "We guarantee you this peace in freedom!"

Strauss accused SPD Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of playing on the people's fears and with their most sacred passions when he claimed that the CDU/CSU is incapable of peace. "We speak the language of peace and we can pursue a policy of peace!"

Strauss, who for 5 minutes was prevented from beginning his speech by the applause and chants of his supporters, again strongly attacked the "popular front" of what he called an association of communists and leftwing radical Social Democrats. He said that Schmidt also "does not cut a good figure with his hypocritical statements" among the slogans which claim that freedom and democracy must be defended against the CDU/CSU.

Schmidt is only the "senior manager" of the leading Marxist group of Wehner, Bahr and Brandt. It is his job to conceal the true aims of the Social Democrats from the people with his behavior and his "theatrical tricks." Typical of the morality of the popular front, which is operating in Moscow's interests, is its statement that Strauss can not be defeated in the elections and that therefore he has to be beaten in the streets. To the jubilation of his supporters Strauss said: "I can only shout to Herr Schmidt: Tell me who supports you, and I'll tell you what sort of person you are."

Strauss emphatically supported the Catholic bishops, whose pastoral letter intended to be read [from the pulpits next Sunday] just a few weeks before the general election has prompted massive criticism from the SPD. What is allowed to all associations and organization in the state also must be allowed to the church.

CDU'S SPAETH SUPPORTS 1937 BORDERS IN BERLIN SPEECH

LD142010 Hambrug DPA in German 1346 GMT 14 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Berlin, 14 Sep (DPA)--Baden-Wuerttemberg Minister-President Lothar Spaeth today supported in Berlin the opinion of exiles' organizations that Germany "continues to exist as a legal concept" within the 1937 borders.

At a rally to mark the "day of the homeland" held under the slogan "policy for the whole of Germany," the CDU politician appealed to the Federal Government to return to a "cleverer, tougher and more decisive German policy." Otherwise, he said, it is possible to foresee the time when German policy would be understood to mean "only looking after the interests of the Federal Republic."

Spaeth said that the annoying feature of the division of Germany was the "violation of the right to self-determination." If the Germans in the GDR decided, "Freely and without pressure," to live in a state such as the GDR, one would have to accept it, even if this led in the long run to there being two states.

BARRE DESCRIBES NEW ECONOMIC, SOCIAL MEASURES

[Text] Speaking on the French television Channel 1 current affairs program on Wednesday, 3 September, Barre explained the economic and social measures announced a few hours earlier after the cabinet meeting, stating in particular:

"As the French people return to work after the holiday this year they are feeling anxious and rather apprehensive about the future. That is understandable.... It was therefore necessary to make the French people realize that the government is aware of their difficulties, is taking them into account and will do what is necessary to forestall or minimize these problems.

"The second reason for our action is that we are entering a period in which there will certainly be a great deal of political agitation and in which, amid the chaos which will arise, people are going to wonder what is happening. It therefore seemed necessary to define a line which is clear and firm so that the French people know what policy the government is following. This has led me to put forward a number of general aims and measures which will guide us in the next few months.

"I would like to point out, before we go any further, that the upward trend in prices is not simply due to the effects of higher oil prices. We are following a policy of adjusting pub'ic service charges because it is necessary to do so. We have increased agricultural prices in the European framework, but that was in keeping with our wishes. It is not, as some people say, price freedom which is behind these price increases. The price increases reflect a general situation which must be brought under control. However, there are many reasons to think that price increases will slow down in the next few months, and I hope that the figures will improve shortly."

With regard to economic activity, Mr Barre stated:

"The depressive effects of the oil blow can be expected to emerge in the next few months, and that is the reason for the government's second objective: to introduce measures to promote consumption and investment which will prevent a recession in France and enable us to maintain a high enough rate of economic activity to prevent a deterioration in the employment situation. We are going through a bad patch, but we have every basis for overcoming these problems, and I can tell you that France is bet er prepared to face the second oil blow than it was to face the first."

[Apparent line drop] of the franc, the premier pointed out: "There are a number of reasons why the government has taken our currency's stability as the cornerstone of its policy, and I would like to recall them. The first, which everybody understands, is that a stable currency is a powerful tool in moderating inflation. The second reason is that a stable and strong currency means that we can avoid any serious increase in our oil bill. The third reason, to which not enough attention is given, is that our currency's stability is essential for our farmers and for French agriculture's position in the Common Market.

"It is not a question of adapting the franc to the behavior of enterprises; instead, enterprises must adapt their behavior to the franc's stability. Indeed, they must keep their production costs down and be competitive. Furthermore they must avoid or eliminate anything which hinders this competitiveness. I draw attention to the need to keep production costs down and especially to keep wages down. We are successfully safeguarding purchasing power, and this is not the time to break loose in this sphere. I can assure you that, as far as government policy is concerned, there will be no modifications in the credit policy, no modifications in the budget policy, in other words we will ensure that budget implementation is as close as possible to the provisions made, and I will use all the means at our disposal to defend the franc. I hope that this is quite clear to people who have certain hopes. I fear that their hopes will not be fulfilled."

Questioned on his social policy, Mr Barre replied:

"The government has always hoped to include social progress in the economic and financial recovery. Of course, it is not possible to do anything remarkable in the difficult periods we have experienced and will experience, but it is possible to note constant progress." The premier mentioned the third national pact for youth employment, the length of the workweek ("I hope that these negotiations will be successful in a balanced way that will constitute progress for the economy and for the workers"), parttime employment, professional training, low wages, and manual laborers' wages.

In conclusion, and in reply to the question whether the government could prevent its action being hampered by the political chaos of the coming months, Mr Barre stated: "Why should the government allow itself to be thrown off course by agitation which will last a few months or allow itself to be forced into concessions or compromises which would be a departure from the line it has laid down? That is why I put a number of general aims to the cabinet meeting, in order to make things clear, to show people where the government is going and what its policy is, and to demonstrate that it will hold fast to this line."

MARCHAIS COMMENTS ON POLISH SITUATION, SOCIALIST DEVELOPMENT

LD131500 [Editorial Report] Paris Domestic Service in French at 1100 GMT on 13 September begins to carry live from the L'HUMANITE outdoor rally in Paris an interview with French Communist Party Secretary General Georges Marchais by Paris radio correspondents Patrice Duhamel and Jacques Hebert.

Marchais begins by stating that he does not anticipate announcing now his candidacy for president, adding that his main concern now is not the elections but the workers' struggle against the consequences of the government's disastrous policies, as reflected by 1.5 million unemployed, a miserable minimum guaranteed income, growing inflation and general working conditions. Marchais remarks that government policies and not the Communist Party are fomenting social unrest.

Marchais is asked about trade union freedoms in Poland, to which he replies: "You say that there is no freedom in Poland, that there is no democracy because there is only one trade union. Well, I draw your attention to the fact that there is only one trade union congress in the FRG or Great Britain. And if you do not say that yourself, at least this is the term used by radio television and the press. I say one cannot limit the problem of democracy to the existence of only one trade union congress. We ourselves are in favor of political pluralism, but as regards the trade unions we believe that the workers' interests lie in unity, trade union unity. Consequently, we support this thesis. This being said, it indeed now seems that in Poland the trade union organization did not accomplish its mission, that is, it did not adequately represent and defend the interests of workers there when they were threatened."

He is next asked if he considers "the Eastern countries' balance sheet on the whole still positive"?

Marchais answers in the affirmative: "The overall balance sheet of the socialist countries is a positive one. We do not bring it down to one single point, as there is a tendency to do here. We take it as a whole. We consider economic development, how economic development is accompanied by social progress and cultural development. We consider democratic development. We consider the socialist countries' share in the struggle for peace and disarmament and if we look at this cluster of issues globally, and if we take into consideration the socialist countries' starting point, then we consider the balance sheet a generally positive one.

"I draw your attention to the fact that everybody is saying: Well done in Turkey; at last there has been a military coup which will make possible the solution of all problems. Just between us, what would you say if instead of a democratic replacement of the first secretary of the Polish party, of the head of the Polish state, we had witnessed a military coup, [words indistinct]. This morning I heard a eulogy on the advantages of a coup d'etat which brought to power in Turkey a general who put politicians who were managing the country's affairs--who in fact are no friends of mine--into prison and banned a number of parties. And everybody explains that all this happened at the moment of NATO maneuvers, at a moment when there was an American admiral present and that [words indistinct] was the first to announce the coup.

"Everybody finds this acceptable, while on the contrary, in Poland, to go back to Poland, what happened was that, I repeat, there are real problems resulting first of all from the development of socialism, problems posed by the consequences of economic crisis in the capitalist countries due to inflation. The arms race hinders the development of the socialist countries and there have also been errors in the management of affairs, in the behavior of the party and in the behavior of the trade unions."

In a last question, Marchais is asked if he would condemn Soviet intervention in Poland, as he condemned Soviet intervention in Prague 12 years ago. He answers by saying that "so far, and it cannot be otherwise, it has been the Poles themselves who have been tackling and solving the problems they are facing in their own country and (?it shall not be otherwise). It is up to the Poles to advance in this direction and, moreover, just now, when inaugurating the international city, [as heard] I was recalling that the Polish Government, the Polish party and the Polish people enjoy our solidarity. We hope that they themselves solve the problems facing them."

Marchais then talks at length on his recently published book, "The Hope Today." The interview ends at 1122 GMT.

PS OFFICIAL INTERVIEWED ON POLISH, DOMESTIC ISSUES

LD121615 Paris LE MATIN in French 3 Sep 80 p 2

[Jean-Francois Doumic and Alexis Liebaert interview with Lionel Jospin, PS national secretary for foreign affairs: "PCF Dodges Issue of Political Power in Paris and in Poland"--date and place of interview not given]

[Text] LE MATIN: French Socialists and Communists welcome the agreement reached in Poland. Does that mean you view events in Gdansk in the same way?

Lionel Jospin: On his return from Bulgaria, Georges Marchais welcomed the agreement which has just been signed. As a Socialist, I welcome it, too. However, to find out whether the Communists and Socialists analyze these events in the same way it is necessary to see whether we welcome the agreement for the same reasons. Judging from statements by PCF leaders and L'HUMANITE's analyses so far, I am not at all convinced that we do.

LE MATIN: Please explain your analysis.

Lionel Jospin: The events in Poland constitute the first mass movement formulating general economic and political objectives in a people's democracy since the postwar period which has not been crushed by repressive forces but which has instead reached a compromise agreement. On the basis of an economic conflict similar to others which have already occurred in Poland in recent years, a whole series of economic, cultural and political demands has been put forward. The PCF, however, gives the impression that it is trying to avoid the political dimension of this conflict. In any case that is what emerges from statements by [PCF Politburo members] Maxime Gremetz and Charles Fiterman and by [CGT leader] Georges Seguy. Although Georges Marchais now welcomes the agreement, he too is trying to gloss over its political aspect. He maintains that the central issue is that of a "new economic policy." However, the central issue raised by this conflict is: Can the Eastern bloc countries evolve and attain real democracy? Do the workers in those countries have the right to be directly involved in "politics"?

LE MATIN: What is your answer to that question?

Lionel Jospin: The answer has merely been outlined: Will the promises be kept? Will censorship be lifted? What role will the new trade union, accepted by the government, play? What means of expression will it have? In any case I note that the Polish Government has gone further than Georges Seguy, who merely hoped for development of the existing official trade union in Poland and rejected the idea of another trade union. There is also another question: Is the agreement limited to the coast? Is the dissidents' release temporary or will they have guarantees for the future?

LE MATIN: Everybody was wondering about a possible Soviet intervention. Do you think there is a threshold above which it would become inevitable?

Lionel Jospin: It is very difficult to define such a threshold since it depends on how the Soviet Union views the risks associated with an intervention: the risk of resistance by the Polish masses, the risk of contagion and the risk of international tension. In any case it is worth pointing out that in 1956 the Soviets did not tolerate the establishment in Hungary of bodies representing another force. Similarly, in 1968 they did not accept the birth of a new communist party in Czechoslovakia or the emergence of other political groups, notably democratic socialists.

LE MATIN: Does this analysis lead to the prediction of an intervention in Poland in the near future?

Lionel Jospin: No, because it must be remembered that, before intervening, the Soviets have always had to find forces within the country providing them with backing and justification. Two factors might protect the Poles: the people's determination and the sense of compromise shown by the strikers and by Gierek's team. As long as they settle their problems themselves, Moscow will find it difficult to find a pretext for an intervention.

LE MATIN: You said recently that movements such as the one which Poland has witnessed are very dangerous for the Soviet regime in the long term....

Lionel Jospin: There can be no doubt that this type of movement seems extremely "subversive" to the Soviets because they are being contradicted by the working class itself. In addition, the problems raised in Gdansk exist in the USSR. That is why we can consider that the Polish workers have won a victory and have taken a step forward, but along a difficult path. The economic problems which were facing Poland have been aggravated by the strike even though the strike might produce the means of solving them. To overcome this situation, it is necessary to introduce far-reaching structural reforms, for which, moreover, the draft agreement makes provision--an agreement which even outlines a new distribution of the national income. In any case we regard the Polish workers' demands as just, and they could make developments possible which, to some extent, are vital to guaranteeing peace in Europe.

LE MATIN: You have called Michel Rocard into line because of his statements in which he defined the stance of a possible socialist president of the republic if faced with a Soviet intervention in Poland.

Lionel Jospin: I certainly did not call him into line. It is neither my nature nor my job to do so. As PS foreign affairs chief, I merely explained our view. Michel Rocard went into great detail about the hypothesis of the Baltic strike movement being crushed (since he was envisaging refugees being picked up by the French Navy) and that was not helpful to the Polish workers. I therefore simply said so.

LE MATIN: Christian Bonnet has also criticized Michel Rocard....

Lionel Jospin: Michel Rocard and I have two things in common which distinguish us from Christian Bonnet: We can both make mistakes but we support the Polish workers, to whose fate Mr Bonnet is as indifferent as he is to that of the French workers. In addition, I do not know whether we are both statesmen, but if having a sense of state means having a sense of honor, neither Michel Rocard nor I has ever stated things on his honor which proved untrue, unlike Christian Bonnet in the Broglie-Poniatowski affair.

LE MATIN: So, those statements had noting to do with the internal campaign on appointing the PS candidate [for the 1981 president election]?

Lionel Jospin: In my view, no. However, that clearly does not seem to be the case with everybody. If everybody is cautious in his statements, there will be no problem.

LE MATIN: When you see the Communists' attitude and the results of the latest IFOP-LE POINT opinion poll, do you believe it is still possible for the left to win in 1981?

Lionel Jospin: Georges Marchais says to us: "Struggles, struggles," but the French workers, like the Polish workers, know that those struggles have little chance of succeeding if there is no political outlet. The PCF leaders place themselves in an untenably inconsistent position when they say: Negotiations are going on in Gdansk but not in Paris. If the government does not negotiate how can struggles be won without changing the government? In short, the PCF leaders are trying to dodge the issue of political power here as in Poland.

As for the opinion poll, I always find it difficult to believe that the more difficult the situation becomes on the economic plane the more satisfied the French people are with the government, and I fail to see what cataclysm could have produced what Giscard has failed to achieve in his 7-year reign: reducing the left's share of the votes to considerably less than 50 percent.

LE MATIN: Do you think that the fact that the PS candidate has not yet been chosen is affecting the opinion poll results?

Lionel Jospin: I don't know. However, that is a question which we must answer. That is what we are planning to do, at the appropriate time.

COSSIGA DISCUSSES COUNTRY'S ECONOMIC SITUATION

AU122047 Rome ANSA in English 1918 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] Bari, 12 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga today inaugurated the Bari Levant trade fair with a wide-ranging exposition of the current Italian economic situation.

The premier said that devaluation of the lira, which has been called for by many Italian industrialists, "cannot be considered a valid remedy to (Italy's) foreign debts nor the loss of Italian products' competivity in world markets.

"Defense of the currency has been a constant concern of the government.

"We wanted and want to avoid adding to the already too high inflation rate another stimulus to more expensive imports that would necessarity result from a devaluation".

Cossiga also dealt with the problem of Italy's underdeveloped south and said that a solution can be reached through a joint commitment of the state and regions.

The premier underscored the need not only for new incentives for the south but also that these incentives be efficiently and speedily of benefit to management.

In this respect, Cossiga said the government pledges to draft "good, clear, simple, functional laws... but it will be up to everyone to act coherently with the objectives that have been set."

With respect to the executive's program, Cossiga described it as "severe" and added that its application requires "confrontation and consensus" both by the government's backers and the opposition and voiced the hope that common objectives be found because a society "which stands only thanks to contrasting visions of its future, has slim possibilities for achieving well-being and civic development".

Cossiga then broadened his analysis of relations between the political parties, echoing the position of Aldo Moro, the former Christian Democrat premier assassinated by the Red Brigades two years ago, who had been a proponent of cooperation and dialogue with the Communist Party.

"If we truly want to renew our republic we must remember Moro. The individuality of the political parties could thereby express itself in a design which can enact unity of objectives and the hopes of our people, within the framework of the dialectic of pluralist societies".

Cossiga then spoke of the thorny issue of the crisis in the auto industry and said that it is necessary that Italian products become once again competitive on the international market, adapting to the technological and structural evolution of the rest of the world and at the same time restoring balance to the relationship between productivity and labor costs.

Referring to the medium-term economic plan still at the drafting stage, Cossiga said that the government intends to use it "to cope with the problems of the Italian economy's structure, which on the one hand are at the origin of inflation and on the other delay employment growth" .

The government considers that the first draft of the program corresponds to the requests made by the various social forces but Cossiga added that it is willing to accept "any suggestion likely to concretely achieve its objectives".

The premier also spoke of the international situation and in particular of Italy's relations with Middle Eastern nations and the strategic arms limitation negotiations.

DANISH DEFENSE MINISTER ON SECRETARY BROWN'S LETTERS

[Excerpt] The parties involved in the defense agreement will, when negotiations on a new defense agreement begin in mid-September, be briefed on U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown's two letters to Defense Minister Poul Sogaard.

Poul Sogaard told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that the views on Danish defenses that the U.S. defense secretary has expressed will form a natural part of the discussions on a new defense plan to take place soon:

[Question] Will the parties get to see the letters?

[Answer] I have not decided yet, but since they are letters addressed to me personally, with all the intimacy that entails, I think that it first and foremost should be the American defense secretary who should decide whether the contents should be made public. But I do not know whether this will change.

FOREIGN MINISTER OLESEN DISCUSSES DANISH DEFENSE POSTURE

[Text] The term "Denmarkization" has so far been used to express anything but praise in connection with Danish foreign policy. But Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen, Social Democratic Party deputy chairman, had adopted the concept and wants to use it positively as an expression of Danish efforts to influence developments in the direction of detente, stopping the arms race and expanding cooperation with the Third World.

In a speech at the Social Democratic congress in the Falkoner Center Kjeld Olesen said that it was the world's greatest and most appalling paradox that, while new, more sophisticated arms systems are always being developed and money channeled without any difficulty into the arms industry, people are dying of hunger or are kept in the deepest poverty. "We can point to these disparities again and again," he said, "but is this not a somewhat resigned approach, which has the foreign press talk of the term 'Denmarkization,' meaning a nation which wants to enjoy but not to contribute to a defense force?"

However, Kjeld Olesen continued: "If Denmarkization becomes an accepted international term, I will not complain--on the contrary." (applause) "Denmarkization is in practice to live up to the ideas contained in the Willy Brandt report and admit our obligations to the Third World. Denmarkization is to contribute to attempts to halt the terrible development of nuclear arms in both East and West. Denmarkization is to actively work to ensure that the coming conference in Madrid on security and cooperation in Europe achieves results. The brutal invasion of Afghanistan must not be forgotten, but it must not be used to hinder the extremely important dialogue between East and West. Denmarkization also means that if we are to move toward detente and disarmament in our part of the world we must achieve a balance as far as conventional arms are concerned. Denmarkization means last but not least that we want to see results. For this reason the way in which we proceed is not unimportant. It is extremely important that there continue to be broad support for Danish security and defense policy."

Kjeld Olesen's speech was received with satisfaction by a number of speakers, who with regard to the defense policy negotiations stressed the need for a zero solution for Danish defense.

DENKTAS SENDS SECOND MESSAGE TO GENERAL EVREN

TA121727 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1630 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] President Denktas has sent two messages to General Evren following the military takeover in Turkey. In his first message, Mr Denktas described the decision of the armed forces as historic and reaffirmed the loyalty of the Turkish Cypriot community to the Turkish motherland. In the second message, which was sent after General Evren's broadcast to the nation, Mr Denktas said he had heard the broadcast with excitement and full approval. He expressed the belief that the armed forces would stamp out violence in Turkey.

The prime minister, Mr Cagatay, also sent a message to General Evren describing the armed forces as the defenders of Kemal Ataturk's principles and the guarantors of the existence and integrity of the Turkish nation.

AKEL REITERATES CRITICISM OF KIPRIANOU'S POLICIES

NC140835 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Report on series of speeches by Mr Ezekias Papaioannou, leader of the Cyprus AKEL party, in Limassol, Larnaca and Nicosia on 9, 10 and 11 September]

[Text] Cyprus will face an unemployment problem during the coming year, the leader of the Cyprus communist AKEL party, Mr Ezekias Papaioannou, said in a speech at which he outlined the party's stance towards the Kiprianou government.

"We totally disagree with the government's economic policy which aims at curbing the development growth, because it leads towards economic crisis", the AKEL leader said and blamed the Kiprianou government for its economic policies no less than for its approach to the national problem.

However, President Kiprianou, in a written statement issued through the public information office, said he does not intend for the time being to reply to anything that tends to aggravate still more the situation especially in view of the forthcoming resumption of the intercommunal talks. At the same time the president said that he was determined to continue his work with a sense of responsibility.

The Akel leader, in speeches at Limassol, Larnaca and Nicosia [on 9, 10 and 11 September] resumed his attack against the reshuffled government and called on President Kiprianou to resign.

"The Council of Ministers is now much worse than the previous one", Mr Papaioannou said, and claimed that the president had ceased to enjoy the confidence of the great majority of the people. "If he does not believe it let him resort to the people's mandate. Besides, theforthcoming general elections will prove it beyond doubt", he said.

Papaioannou insisted that President Kiprianou accepts only in words the Makarios-Denktas guidelines and accused him of failing to live up to the pledges for a purge.

Turning to the government's policies towards the economy and inflation he said:

"The future of the Cyprus economy is not bright. There are serious indications that during the coming year there will be an unemployment problem. The exploiters may well seek unemployment for their own profiteering purposes. To be sure, big capital will try to attack the acquired rights of the working people".

"We totally disagree with the government economic policy aimed at curbing the development growth rate. This policy contributes to economic crisis. We are a developing country and curbing development growth cannot but affect the whole Cypriot economy. There is room for development in industry, and agriculture", he said.

Mr Papaioannou urged wider state intervention, total acquisition of the oil refinery which would, he said, ease the repercussions from petrol price hikes and benefit the public, and total ownership of the fertilisers factory under construction.

He also attacked government policy towards tourism which allows it to be exploited for easy profit at the expense of the country's good name.

The AKEL leader also referred to the deficit in the trade and balance of payments and said that the policy of austerity about which the president spoke applied only to the poorer classes "who of necessity observe it because their incomes are so low that they cannot do otherwise".

DEFINITE SPLIT CLAIMED IN RULING PARTY LEADERSHIP

NC150822 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 15 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] The countdown for a change in the domestic political situation actually begins today with the return from Athens of Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis, DIKO [Democratic Front Party] deputy chairman and president of the House of Representatives. Mikhaililidhis has already passed the word and will now put the president of the republic and DIKO chairman directly on the spot. Either he (Kiprianou) leaves the party or he himself (MIKHAILIDHIS) will withdraw together with his deputies and other leading members.

This has been disclosed by Mikhailidhis' close contacts who added: Things will definitely clear up in the next few days when domestic developments in general will also be speeded up.

The same circles also added that Mikhailidhis' withdrawal would cause fundamental change in the composition of the House of Representatives and thus create a new situation with obvious consequences.

It is believed that the president of the house controls at least 8 out of the 19 deputies. Given the fact that the 4 PEK [Pan-Agrarian Union of Cyprus] deputies and Mr Vakis will definitely withdraw, this means that only 5-6 deputies will be left in the house as a Kiprianou group. At the same time, however, the DIKO deputy chairman also controls many district committees and leading members, a fact which means the definite dissolution of the party.

It is not yet known what Mikhailidhis would actually do later. However, if Kiprianou finally leaves the party, Mikhailidhis has the contacts for a wider cooperation between DIKO and other forces. Some consultations and soundings have already been held at various levels. However, the important thing is the fact that: A radical change in the composition of the house would possibly lead to early elections while it would also raise broader issues related to the president of the republic himself. Mr Mikhailidhis has already warned his close associates to prepare themselves, particularly in view of the cabinate reshuffle about which he had not been briefed nor had his views even been taken into consideration.

LEADERS, PRESS COMMENT ON TURKISH COUP

Mitsotakis Statement

AT131240 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 13 Sep 80

[Text] Greece is following with undiminished interest the developments in Turkey which last Wednesday [as heard] ended in the armed forces intervention. The Greek people and the Greek Government regret these developments and hope that the military leadership will lead this neighboring country to the restoration and strengthening of democratic institutions as soon as possible.

Minister for Foreign Affairs Mitsotakis made a relevant statement at noon, noting the following:

Greece, as an immediately neighboring country, has followed with undiminished interest the developments of the last few months in neighboring Turkey which ended in yesterday's intervention by the armed forces. The Greek people and the Greek Government regret these developments and hope that the military leadership will lead this neighboring country, as soon as possible, to the restoration and strengthening of democratic institutions for the progress and prosperity of the Turkish people and that human rights, which constitute the common credo of free democratic societies, will be respected.

We have noted with special attention, Minister of Foreign Affairs Mitsotakis continued, the assurance of General Evren that the Turkish military leadership intends to return power to the people as soon as possible. With the same attention we have noted the Turkish military leadership's intention to respect its international obligations and seek the peaceful settlement of international differences.

The Greek Government, Mitsotakis concluded, has already positively responded to the wish which the Turkish side has expressed for the continuation of the Greek-Turkish dialogue. We hope that the new Turkish leadership will constructively confront the development of relations between our two countries on the basis of Ataturk's principles.

Papandreou 'Sorrow'

AT131248 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 13 Sep 80 p 1

[Excerpt] Contrary to the government, which has been cautious in expressing criticism of the situation in Turkey, the parties of the opposition have disapproved of the coup and have blamed the United States and NATO for it.

A. Papandreou has made the following statements:

"I express my profound sorrow at the developments in Turkey which are depriving the Turkish people of the limited freedoms they enjoyed under the government of Demirel. For a long time Turkey has been convulsed by social and political clashes while it has been simultaneously confronting strong movements for autonomy. We are certain that the imposition of a military dictatorship will not only not solve the explosive problems of Turkish society but, on the contrary, will lead to a social explosion of immense dimensions. Of course it is not accidental that the military coup occurred during the NATO exercises in Turkey, especially during the presence of the commander of NATO's southeastern wing, William Sharp. On the contrary, it is clear that the coup is a NATO coup and aims at the quickest implementation of NATO plans in the areas of the Middle East, eastern Mediterranean, Cyprus and the Aegean. We are sure that our country's armed forces, with the unanimous support of the entire Hellenic people, will preserve our country's territorial integrity from wherever threats may come."

KKE-Exterior Reaction

[Text] Because of the military coup in Turkey the KKE-Exterior Central Committee press office yesterday published the following statement:

"Early this morning the leadership of the Turkish Armed Forces abolished the government, arrested political leaders and ended all vestiges of parliamentary order in our neighboring country. The coup of Ankara's militarists has completed the logic which the Turkish Government of the right itself had established through the imposition of martial law in many provinces, the status of special measures and merciless persecution of democratic forces.

"The fact that NATO circles in Brussels officially stated 1 day before the coup that they base all their hopes concerning Turkey on a decisive intervention by the military leadership as well as the fact that the announcement of the coup was made in Washington confirm the substantive role of the United States and NATO in the intervention of the Turkish militarists.

"Turkey's military leadership has used NATO weapons first and principally against progressive forces, against the workers' class and against Turkey's other working people. The KKE-Exterior expresses its militant solidarity with the heroic fighters of the Turkish Communist Party, other progressive forces and all Turkish democrats, who, under even tougher conditions, are continuing the struggle against militarism and fanaticism for democracy, independence and social progress.

"It is obvious that the imperialists plan to use the Turkish military regime in order to facilitate the imposition of Atlantic settlements regarding problems of the southeastern wing of NATO and Greek-Turkish differences.

"The Greek Government does not have the right to ignore the dangers which are being created by these new developments. We ask it to immediately sever negotiations on NATO and the bases and to condemn the military coup in Turkey as the antidictatorial feelings of the Greek people dictate."

KKE-Interior Statement

AT131330 Athens I AVYI in Greek 13 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] The KKE-Interior press office has published the following statement:

"The KKE-Interior expresses its solidarity with the workers class, the working people of Turkey and all progressive forces which since yesterday have been confronting an undisguised army intervention in political life that has abolished all democratic freedoms. Once again it is confirmed that Turkey's ruling class and the foreign imperialists who support it did not hesitate to resort to armed violence and militarist power in order to perpetuate their sovereignty when it was being shaken by the people's resistance.

"The unaccountable murderous activity of fascist gangs opened the road to the militarist coup. The true instigators, however, are again U.S. imperialism and NATO. Complete proof is perhaps this 'coincidence': At the time when the armed forces were assuming power in Ankara, large NATO military exercises were being held in eastern Thrace--thus, because of the state of affairs there, constituting the Atlantic organization's blessing for the abolition of the Turkish people's constitutional freedoms.

"Currently it is more obvious than at any other time that the solutions to existing problems between our two countries and to the Cyprus problem are to be found in the defeat of the policy of Atlanticism and of the attachment of the United States which brought to Greece the April dictatorship and led to the treason of Cyprus and to the Turkish invasion of the island and now to the militarist dictatorship in Turkey.

"In view of the disturbing developments in our neighboring country it is necessary to have national and democratic vigilance, equanimity and steadfast promotion of a national policy that will finally rid us of a return to NATO and the presence of foreign bases on our soil, will guarantee our national integrity and independence, and will render our country democratic and peaceful distinction."

MESIMVRINI: Coup Inevitable

AT121414 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 12 Sep 80 p 1

[From the "Positions" Column]

[Text] Only those people who are naive or who deliberately close their eyes could not see where the orgy of violence in conjunction with the economic and social misery in Turkey's chronically sick "democracy" would end with mathematical precision: to its final and formal overthrow. Only the imprudent optimism of certain Western governments (together with the easily understood care of the Eastern countries) insisted on funneling in a gold mine of unrepayable loans in order to "buttress" the rotten structure of the regime and its adventurist foreign policy.

Our country, which has suffered so much from its neighboring country, cannot feel joy at its plight. It worries! Once again, all seriousness and sense of the criticalness of the situation and all equanimity must be mustered so that our tranquillity may not be jeopardized by the unknown will of the Turkish coupists.

ESTIA Comment

AT121445 Athens ESTIA in Greek 12 Sep 80 p 2

[From the "World" column: "The Change in Turkey"]

[Text] Of course no one is surprised by today's military coup in Turkey and the sweeping aside of Demirel's government by the army because, on the one hand, the oppressive presence of this country's armed forces on the political backdrop was always clear; on the other, bloodshed has increased so much recently that it has presented the picture of a civil war from one end of the country to the other. After all, the warning of the chief of the Turkish Armed Forces, General Evren, that "the army could immediately put an end to the anomaly" had been dangling for weeks. Nobody knows whether or not an end will now be put to the internal disturbances since the various social and political cancers of what is accurately described as "the great sick man" are constantly spreading. What is rather certain is that Turkey will not be able in the foreseeable future to enter onto the stage of true democracy since it has never, in fact, inaugurated it.

We in Greece are seriously interested in the new turn of Turkish events for reasons that are easily understood.

There are two main reasons: first, "bilateral differences" have been under negotiation for 5 years or more--with very bad results of course; secondly, the Cyprus issue, which is just entering a new stage, will possibly stagnate or dangerously deteriorate. Although it is the urgent duty of the Greek Government to see and assess in good time all these things and their possible developments, nevertheless one awaits to see how the West's "democratic" conscience, which is so sensitive to our own political affairs, will feel the change in Turkey given the fact that the West's conscience was not much offended by the army's interventions in Turkey in 1960 and 1971. It is high time that Europe, at least, understands the true nature of its chosen and expensive Asian partner.

VOTCP URGES STRONG RESISTANCE AGAINST 'PRO-AMERICAN' JUNTA

[Appeal issued by Turkish Communist Party Central Committee on 12 September 1980]

[Excerpts] Workers, peasants and our patriotic people, the junta called the National Security Council has seized the administration. It dissolved the parliament, closed down all the political parties and abolished the constitution. The junta thus terminated the bourgeois parliamentary system and replaced it with an overt military dictatorship. The thrust of the attack is directed against the working class, the toilers, the progressive parties, the class unions, the democratic organizations, the democratic press, the Kurdish national movement and the anti-American religious masses.

The imperialist plot, which the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] has been warning about for a long time, was realized through the 12 September coup. Through this plot, imperialist centers which are aggravating the international situation aim to use our country more easily as a tool for their plans. The existence of a military dictatorship in Turkey further threatens peace and security in the region.

At a time when the crisis has become extraordinarily deep, the military junta has blocked the progress of the people's movement—which could not be prevented through parliamentary means—and aims to lay, through greater tyranny, the burden of the crisis on the people. Through its statements, the junta is attempting to deceive the people. It is stating that it was forced to seize the administration because the political parties, the parliament and the constitutional organizations were unable to fulfill their duties regarding terrorism. However, it is known that the shadow government called the National Security Council has been sharing the power for a long time and that the generals at the head of the junta today were authorized to take the measures they want through the martial law commands. Moreover, there are also certain pro-fascist martial law commanders among the perpetrators of terrorism, that is incited by the imperialists, who are loyal to this junta. The junta is pretending to be as opposed to the leaders of the NAP and the JP as it is to the leftists in a bid to deceive millions of people. Actually, through its statements and measures, it is following the reactionary and antipeople policy of the government which it just toppled.

The junta is abolishing the democratic freedoms to which the NAP is strongly opposed. In a bid to deceive the millions of workers who are resisting the monopolies, the generals are pretending to be equally against the Confederation of Nationalists Labor Unions [MISK] and the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK]. However, they are depriving the working class of its progressive syndical organization against the monopolies and their organization—the Turkish Confederation of Employer Unions [TISK].

The junta is claiming that it is loyal to Ataturk's principles and that it assumed power to avert the threat against national sovereignty in order to exploit the patriotic feelings of our people and to mislead them. However, from the first day, the generals of the junta announced their loyalty to NATO, which constitutes the greatest threat to our national sovereignty, and to the bilateral slavery agreement, which confronts Turkey with neighboring countries. Despite all the attempts to conceal them, the real aims and character of the junta are clear. This junta, which is comprised of pro-American and pro-NATO generals, is against our people, our national independence, our sovereignty and primarily against the working class and all the democratic forces. It serves the interests of imperialism and the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie.

The junta, which is facing the various sectors of the bourgeoisie as well as the working class and the toilers, will not be able to solve any of the primary problems currently facing Turkey. This military and despotic system will be destroyed through the joint resistance of all forces which are in favor of democracy and freedom. The TCP is standing upright and it is struggling with all its force. It is the communists' duty to serve as an example to all the democracy and freedom forces, to strengthen the power for struggle, and to enhance the solidarity of struggle among all these forces.

Members of the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Socialist Workers Party, the RPP, the NSP, the Kurdish democrats and everyone who is opposed to the pro-American junta should abandon their differences and unite in solidarity for this resistance. All the forces that wish to struggle against the junta should not bow down to organizational restrictions and should establish new clandestine organizations in accordance with the new conditions.

Patriotic soldiers, non-commissioned officers and officers should not allow the pro-American junta to unleash the army against the people and should support the people's resistance against the junta, which is protecting the interests of the United States and NATO. All citizens, unite in the resistance against the pro-American junta!

[Signed] TCP Central Committee, 12 September, 1980.

NEWSPAPERS REPORT, COMMENT ON MILITARY COUP

NC151030 [Editorial Report] The Istanbul Turkish-language newspapers CUMHURIYET, MILLIYET, TERCUMAN and GUNAYDIN on 13 September carry banner headlines announcing the 12 September Turkish Armed Forces' takeover in Turkey. They also carry the photographs of General Kenan Evren and the forces' commanders, identifying them as president and members respectively of the National Security Council. TERCUMAN and MILLIYET carry the full text of General Evren's 12 September radio and television statement. All papers carry the communiques issued by the National Security Council. All four papers also carry foreign comment on the military coup, quoting statements by the leaders of various countries, including the United States. None of these papers carry comment critical of the military takeover.

Commenting on the developments, MILLIYET's Refik Erduran comments: "In other countries, when administrations unexpectedly change hands, a lot of blood is usually shed. In our country, 12 September 1980 was the first bloodless day for years. People can interpret matters as they wish in their own minds and they can engage in any abstract evaluation, but it would be extremely misleading not to bear in mind the fact that this concrete situation has brought relief to a vast majority of our fellow countrymen. It is the duty of every patriot of good will to preserve this 'bloodlessness' in the period immediately ahead of us." Erduran further writes: "A dentist does not pull a decayed tooth just because 'he likes to do so.' The tooth is pulled because it is decayed and the ache is unbearable. Once the result has been obtained, it is meaningless and useless to argue idly about the event. The question for which an answer should be sought is: Why did the tooth decay? What can be done to prevent other teeth from decaying? This is what we must all consider at the moment. And, we must do this with cool heads."

In his TERCUMAN "Cornerstone" column, Ergun Goze comments: "We welcome the military intervention, which is the outcome of the tense circumstances provoked by anarchy, separatism, communism and other perverse trends and which was carried out in a civilized manner befitting our nation and with great regard for the national existence and national will. We also welcome this action in the full realization that the unity of the state needs sacrifice, dignity and farsightedness, which our history inspires. We realize our national duty and we pray most warmly for the survival and integrity of our state."

CUMHURIYET columnist Oktay Akbal describes the situation which led to the military takeover: "A parliament that was unable to elect a president of the republic for the past six months... a minority government that has been vacillating in a deadlock... a political leader who has been tested so many times and found to be useless and unsuccessful... a main opposition that has been caught up in the turmoil of internal skirmishes... two reactionary parties, one close to fascism and the other exploiting religious fanaticism, both led by unreliable and inconsistent politicians... some small parties on the left opposing one another... in addition to all this, several 'factions' which consider themselves masters unto themselves... an increasing death toll every day... liberated areas, towns and a totally degenerated state mechanism." The writer states that under such circumstances, Turkey was bound to end up where it has. In conclusion, he says: "Now a new page has been opened. This new page is expected to take long strides along the lines of revolutionary democracy with which Ataturk had identified himself. Our people long to see such democracy, such a true democracy, established in Turkey. We hope that the future will bring our nation and our fatherland happy and confidence-inspiring days."

RELATIONS WITH TURKEY TO CONTINUE; EURO-ARAB DIALOGUE EXPECTED

[Text] Brussels, 16 Sep (AFP)--That the European Common Market has no intention of severing links with Turkey after last week's military coup there became clear here last night after a council meeting of market foreign ministers. They issued a joint statement voicing great concern about the coup, but also noted assurances given by the military about a rapid return to democratic rule.

The statement made no reference to economic co-operation with Turkey, which has been associated with the Common Market since 1964. Observers said that meant the Common Market had no intention, for the moment at least, of calling into question either the existing customs arrangement or financial aid for Turkey.

[London's THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English on 16 September on page 28 adds: "Sir Ian Gilmour, deputy foreign secretary, made it clear that the 'Nine' deplored not merely the coup but also the political violence and instability which preceded it. He declined to say how long the 'Nine' were prepared to give the military leadership in Ankara before reconsidering a freeze of relations."]

The foreign ministers agreed to go into specifics about the contents of the joint declaration on the Middle East issued at the European summit in Venice last June. In coming weeks, experts are to go into the details of the principles formulated then concerning Israeli evacuation of occupied territories, the Palestinian right to self-determination, and Israel's security, French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet said. He said the European Council meeting in Luxembourg in the first week of December might re-open discussions on a European Mideast initiative.

At the end of this month, meanwhile, a start is expected on renewing Euro-Arab dialogue when Luxembourg Foreign Minister Gaston Thorn, current chairman of the Common Market, is scheduled to meet Arab League Secretary-General Chedli Klibi of Tunisia. Community sources here said that meeting might result in a ministerial-level meeting next year of the Common Market and Arab League countries.

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "Rows With France Likely on EEC Budget and Trade"]

[Text] Rome--International and internal problems face the Common Market institutions which begin work in earnest in Brussels today after a long summer break. As far as Britain is concerned further trouble can be expected from France.

Turkey and the EEC's Middle East peace initiative are the two foremost items on the agenda for the foreign ministers of the Nine.

But Britain can expect further French objections over the massive refund of Britain's budget contributions; sheep meat; fishing rights; and the admission to the Nine of Spain and Portugal which the French see as a threat to their wine industry.

On Turkey the major question is whether or not to freeze the present association agreement between that country and the EEC following the coup last week. The expectation is that no action will be taken on Turkey. No meetings under the agreement are scheduled for the near future.

On the Middle East problems, Mr Gaston Thorn, the next president of the EEC Commission, is touring Middle East capitals to determine the scope for an EEC initiative.

If the Nine do agree to launch a drive in the United Nations to secure greater formal recognition of Palestinian rights it is unlikely this will take place until after the American presidential election in November.

For Britain, which will be represented by Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, the most direct issue to be tackled next week could be over the machinery for refunding part of Britain's excessively large EEC budget contributions.

Although the principle of the refunds and the scale--about 1,600 million pounds over this year and the next combined--were agreed some months ago it has become clear that France, and to a lesser extent Germany, want to set exacting conditions for the release of the money.

France is insisting the allocations be approved unanimously by ministers of the Nine beforehand--giving any one country a power of veto. Britain is strenuously resisting this condition. Which runs counter to the spirit of the compromises reached on the budget, and it is supported by most other countries and the Brussels commission.

There are numerous other issues which pit Britain against France and could lead to a serious worsening of relations between the two countries in the near future. These include the "apple war," moves to develop a policy to support lamb and mutton producers, the future terms for making New Zealand butter exports into the EEC and potentially the most troublesome of all, the attempt to agree to a common EEC fisheries policy. The House of Lords select committee on Europe has just stated that Britain should get at least 45 percent of EEC fish stocks under the proposed quota system by Brussels has offered only 31 percent. And that may be too much for some countries.

More important in the long run will be the start taken in the next few months to reform the EEC's budgetary system to prevent recurrences of the "British problem" of over-payment. This will inevitably involve major changes in the financings of agriculture, which takes the lion's share of EEC spending. A long, tough struggle can be anticipated. Finally the next few months will be the last in the life of the Roy Jenkins Commission in Brussels. Mr Jenkins will return to politics in Britain, to be succeeded here by Mr Thorn. Mr Tugendhat, the present junior British commissioner, will stay on in Brussels along with probably about six others of the 13 man team.

OFFICIALS DISCUSS TRADE PROBLEMS WITH JAPAN

OW110307 Tokyo KYODO in English 0153 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] Brussels, Sept 10 KYODO--Wilhelm Haferkamp, vice president of the European Communities Commission, warned Wednesday that the commission many not be able to continue to curb protectionism unless Japan-EC trade relations are improved immediately. In a meeting with Takaaki Kagawa, Japanese ambassador to the Japanese delegation to the EC Commission, he said problems have arisen in certain sectors of Japan-EC trade relations. If such problems continue to aggravate, he said, the EC commission may have to abandon its efforts to curb trade protectionism in close collaboration with Japan.

Haferkamp did not name the areas of trouble but he is believed to have had in mind such matters as rising Japanese car and color television receiver exports to European countries, informed sources said. Apart from the automobile trade issue, Etienne Davignon, EC commissioner for internal market and industrial affairs, expressed concern Tuesday over a sharp increase in Japan's exports of color TV sets to West Germany in recent months. In the May-July period, Davignon said, also in a meeting with Kagawa, that Japan's color TV set shipments to West Germany registered a particularly steep increase with July shipments scoring a 112 percent jump over the same month last year. Haferkamp did not mention any steps to be taken by Japan to improve bilateral trade relations at the meeting with Kagawa. He just said that the commission hopes to solve the problems through talks with Japan on every level.

SAUDI PETROLEUM MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON ARRIVAL IN VIENNA

[Guenter Schmidt and Gerd Friedrich report on arrival of OPEC ministers at Vienna's Schwechat Airport with interview with Saudi oil minister--recorded]

[Excerpt] In the late afternoon Saudi Petroleum Minister Shaykh Yamani arrived by special plane in Vienna. He will be the main actor in any OPEC debate. Tomorrow the ministers will submit a report which, among other things envisages a system of automatic oil price increases. Instead of exposing the world time and again to dramatic oil price shocks OPEC wants quarterly oil price adjustments which can be calculated by means of a complicated formula, a formula which takes into consideration the development of inflation and the economy in the industrial nations. Radical OPEC states have objected to this. They also want to include their own countries' needs for money. This would involve higher prices. Yamani stated about these problems:

[Yamani in English] I think we found a formula at our last conference. The section about prices was adopted by the majority of states, with the exception of Libya, Iran and Algeria. We will discuss this and hopefully we will have a unanimous position.

[Question] Have you brought along a new compromise formula?

[Answer] No, I do not think that we are aiming at a compromise. The majority will not change.

[Herbert Hutter and Karl Jirkovsky report on Vienna OPEC conference with interviews with Iraqi Oil Minister 'Abd al-Karim and Saudi Petroleum Minister Shaykh Ahmad Zaki Yamani, recorded in Arabic and English, with subsequent German translation--passages within quotations transcribed from English]

[Excerpts] To the question as to whether he felt safe in Vienna, Iraqi Oil Minister 'Abd al-Karim told me after his arrival: I personally am not resentful. Quite the contrary: I visited Vienna in the 2d year [after the attack on Vienna's OPEC headquarters] and the next year. I was also in Vienna last year, and I think that what happened in Vienna could happen anywhere. I personally am in favor of OPEC's headquarters' remaining in Vienna and I think that all the sessions should also be held here in Vienna. I think that the Austrian Government is capable of preventing anything from happening.

To the question of how he felt in Vienna Saudi Minister Yamani stated: "Oh, very happy."

[Question] But there will be tough debates at the conference itself. Once already a plan of an OPEC majority for a long-term price strategy was frustrated by the objections of Algeria, Libya and Iran. Will there be a compromise in Vienna?

[Yamani] "No, I do not think we are in for a compromise. I do not think the majority will change."

The situation is being exacerbated by the Iranian-Iraqi border conflict.

'Abd al-Karim stated in this context: "I think the relations (?between us are tense). If relations between two OPEC countries are so bad or have become so bad this is most likely to also affect (?the session) even though we, properly speaking, would very much like to have good relations with all countries. There have been not very good relations between OPEC countries in the past few years but this has not had any decisive influence on OPEC as such."

But there will be agreement on further development projects which exceed the present OPEC development fund. Pertinent recommendations will be submitted to the OPEC summit conference in Baghdad in November.

Finally, something about quantities and prices: There will be a shortage of 250,000 to 300,000 million tons of oil annually in the coming 10 years, said 'Abd al-Karim, regardless of the present surplus. But this surplus, in the opinion of the Venezuelan oil minister, means that no further oil price increases are expected this year.

OPEC MINISTERS BEGIN CONSULTATIONS

AU151233 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1200 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Text] The foreign finance and energy ministers of OPEC, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, met today for the 1st of 2 days of consultations in Vienna's Hofburg Palace. Central to the talks is the problem of indexing the price of oil and development aid. The conference is intended, among other things, to prepare the summit conference of heads of state and government of the 13 OPEC countries, envisaged for early November this year in Baghdad. While Saudi Arabia may demand an automatic regulation of oil prices guided by inflation rates, economic growth and fluctuations of exchange rates in the Western industrial countries. Iranian Oil Minister Mo'infar stated that if there is no short-term decision about production quantities, a long-term price strategy is nonsense. Several delegates, including the representatives of Algeria and Indonesia, demanded that Saudi Arabia increase the price of a barrel of crude--159 liters--to $32, like the other OPEC countries.

Clash Over Chairmanship

AU151427 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1400 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Text] A conflict between Iran and Iraq broke out at the OPEC conference in Vienna today. Evidently, against a background of conflict between the two countries in the common border region, the Iranian delegation has vetoed the assumption of the conference chairmanship by Iraq. The quarrel was finally ended with a compromise proposal by Venezuela according to which Algeria will take the chair.

TWO IRAQI DIPLOMATS TO BE DEPORTED FROM W. BERLIN

LD151254 Hamburg DPA in German 1205 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin, (DPA)--The two Iraqi diplomats accused in West Berlin of attempting to carry out a bombing attack are being deported without criminal proceedings. This was confirmed today by Senat Spokesman Hermann Meyn. He gave no further details for the time being. In making this decision the Berlin Senat is complying with the wishes of the Federal Government which favored the two Iraqis being deported for overriding reasons.

The two Iraqi diplomats, accredited in East Berlin, were arrested on 1 August this year in West Berlin during an attempted bombing of a meeting of Iraqi students.

Dietrich Stobbe [Berlin's governing mayor] stressed in a statement that he had made the decision after carefully weighing the state's interest in criminal proceedings and security and foreign policy considerations. For the Berlin Senat and the Federal Government, the long, tough negotiations were worthwhile. The Federal Government managed to get the Iraqi side's agreement to Berlin's demands. Stobbe asked the police in particular to have understanding for his decision.

The Iraqi side has apparently given assurances that after their deportation the diplomats will no longer be assigned to the East Berlin Embassy and will not return to West Berlin or the Federal Republic. An assurance is also said to have been given that no attacks by Iraqis or Iraqi organizations are to be feared in Berlin.

Heinrich Lummer, chairman of the CDU group in Berlin's Chamber of Deputies, said that the decision could "never satisfy anyone." The public is disappointed that the deportation is apparently to take place before proceedings have been concluded and before the public has been informed as to the reasons and background. The negotiations between the Senat and Federal Government which have gone on for weeks gave rise to doubts, according to the opposition politician, as to "whether the reasons given by the Federal Government are convincing and whether the suspicion of having made a concession with a reciprocal promise have been removed."

GENSCHER DISCUSSES DETENTE, MADRID CSCE, TURKEY

[Text] Bonn/Berlin (DPA)--In the view of Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, actively guaranteeing peace and preventing or "controlling" conflicts are central tasks of a responsible foreign policy. Speaking today in Berlin to the Federation of Repatriated Germans, Genscher stressed that the policy of detente's effect in controlling conflicts now has to prove itself in connection with the events in Poland. The process of the European security conference (CSCE) is an "excellent instrument" for controlling and overcoming conflicts.

The federal foreign minister said that the successful conclusion of the security conference in Helsinki and the publication of the Final Act have shown that, despite the existing differences and contrasts, it is possible in Europe to formulate a common platform of all the states involved. Even if there are no means of "enforcing" the promises, common interest in continuing the process has become an important factor in the calculations of the states involved. The Federal Government will insist at the forthcoming followup meeting in Madrid that all parts of the Final Act and their implementation be discussed "thoroughly and with equal emphasis." Genscher said: "We will hold a businesslike debate." "We are as little interested in verbose polemics as in suppressing concerns."

Genscher again came out in favor of a definite mandate for the convening of a European disarmament conference being given at the Madrid meeting. In accordance with the French initiative, this conference has to have as its aim the further development of militarily significant and verifiable confidence-building measures. On the European continent as a whole, the foreign minister stressed: "What is essential for us here is the entire scope of Europe, this means including the European part of the Soviet Union." Only under this precondition could confidence-building measures develop their effect as an element in controlling conflicts.

Genscher said that the further development of such measures is of considerable importance for the future at a time when the confidence which has grown during the policy of detente in Europe is being bogged down and disturbed by new developments.

Genscher also underlined the importance of the United Nations, which despite imperfections, has long ago become indispensable. "We must not forget that it is in the United Nations that there originates more and more the forming of a world opinion which, with the growing importance of the nonaligned, is increasingly becoming a political factor." Not to have been a UN member would have robbed Bonn of the opportunity of helping solve fateful questions of mankind. The German candidacy for the office of president of the forthcoming General Assembly would open up new opportunities.

Interview on Turkey, Other Issues

DW151204 Frankfurt Hessischer Rundfunk Network in German 1000 GMT 14 Sep 80

[Excerpt] [Question] In this series of talks, Mr Genscher, the party chairmen have been making statements with a view to 5 October. In contrast to your colleagues, however, you also hold an important government office. Because of recent events we will put questions to you first of all in your capacity as foreign minister. The military coup in Turkey cannot leave NATO or the Federal Republic unconcerned. How do you assess these events?

[Answer] Turkey is a strategically important ally and a country with which we have traditional friendly relations. That was a reason enough for us to feel very concerned in the past years about Turkey, and not least this was the reason for the Federal Government's efforts to help Turkey overcome its economic problems. Nobody can make a final assessment today about the aims pursued by the military men who have taken over. But we as allies expect those who hold power now to restore democratic conditions as soon as possible. We also expect the democratic politicians to show determination and demonstrate convincingly the ability of a democratic Turkey to act. Most of all I hope that the terrible bloodshed that takes place every day in Turkey will now end.

[Question] So one can assume that nothing will change about our economic and financial aid programs for Turkey?

[Answer] I must emphatically warn against hasty decisions. Naturally that is a question we must discuss with our allies and partners in the European Community and with our NATO allies. It would be absolutely wrong if premature steps were taken which might have the effect of making what has been achieved so far go up in a puff of smoke.

[Question] Let us discuss a second issue involving the federal foreign minister: the situation in Poland. In the past weeks the West has avoided bringing influence to bear on developments in Poland which could aggravate tension there. Do you believe that the Soviet Union will take this approach by the West into consideration, for example, with regard to confidence-building measures?

[Answer] First of all one does not have to orient one's political activities by whether another country will take something into consideration or not. One must act in line with one's responsibility. It is indeed in line with this responsibility that we decided at the beginning of the Polish events, as well as for the future, not to become involved in any way in internal developments in Poland. It does not mean, however, that we do not wholeheartedly follow developments there. Restraint is called for politically, economically; however one ought to help the Poles and facilitate the overcoming of their material problems.

As regards action by the Soviet Union--you were hinting at the Madrid conference by mentioning confidence-building measures--one must indeed expect a discussion about the mission of a European disarmament conference. It is our aim in Madrid to draw up a wide-ranging balance sheet with regard to multilateral detente policy; all parts of the final Helsinki document must be discussed from the viewpoint of what has been implemented, what remains to be done to implement what all committed themselves to in Helsinki.

I hope that we will achieve a European disarmament conference. It does not suffice to say: We will have a conference. It is necessary to specifically commission somebody in Madrid with regard to the conference. It is our aim, in line with the French suggestion, that the commission should deal with the agreement on confidence-building measures in Europe--which means from the Atlantic to the Urals, including the European part of the Soviet Union. Building confidence is something that must cover the whole area under discussion. No exclusions from treaties are possible. Otherwise matters would turn out exactly the opposite of what is desired when it comes to building confidence.

[Question] This probably means that Afghanistan cannot be exempted in Madrid, although it is not a European country and thus also not a European problem?

[Answer] I do not think one can say that it is not a European problem. We planned with regard to the final document of Helsinki to act everywhere in accordance with the principles of the final document. Seen that way it includes the action of the signatory states in other parts of the world--such as the continuing Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. Those who want to pursue detente policy with more than empty phrases and who honestly mean detente policy cannot be interested in excluding the Afghanistan issue. We would not be able to explain to anybody in Europe or the world why this difficult problem was not discussed. The German-French statement says in this respect, for example, that the intervention was a hard blow to detente, which demonstrates that detente is not divisible. Detente is indivisible by nature, for otherwise it could not be explained how the Afghanistan events have automatically brought influence to bear on the situation in Europe.

[Question] I just want to quote that statement once more: Detente cannot stand politically one more event such as Afghanistan. Do you believe that such a political attitude has brought influence to bear on Moscow in the sense that it has maintained restraint vis-a-vis Poland?

[Answer] What I meant when I said that we do not want to interfere in developments in Poland, what I meant in mentioning political restraint, makes me now refrain from speculating on whether or why the Soviet Union does or does not maintain restraint.

[Question] Let us use the term detente and the indivisibility of detente with regard to relations between both German states. It has been said, Mr Genscher, that on the eve of the termination of Federal Chancellor Schmidt's visit to GDR State Council Chairman Honecker, you supported the federal chancellor in not making the visit at that time. What made you do that?

[Answer] There was no need to support the federal chancellor in this matter. But we both appeared at the discussion with the same conclusion after thorough consideration, namely, that the visit should not take place.

We were of the opinion that due to developments in Poland it would certainly not be good to expose the visit to uncertainties, a visit from which we expected progress to materialize. We also believed that the circumstances surrounding the visit ought to be such that one could really expect political results to be achieved. All this taken together forced us to the conclusion that the date originally picked was not the right one. We then suggested a postponement. These are decisions one must frequently make if one is seriously interested in positive developments in relations. One must create frameworks such that the meetings themselves will show promise.

[Question] But it was always your contention and that of the social-liberal coalition that one must talk to each other particularly in times of crises.

[Answer] If there are crisis-like relations between two states one can--I even say one must--seek direct talks if need be. I will cite an example in just a moment. But in this case it was not a matter of overcoming a crisis between the Federal Republic and the GDR, on the contrary. If you read all the public statements from all sides, from the government parties and even more so from the opposition, made prior to the visit, it was a matter of achieving further improvements in German-German relations. A visit under unfortunate conditions could have possibl created a setback. The interesting thing about the federal chancellor's visit to the GDR is that when there were critical international situations in the past, people were worried that they could backfire on German-German relations. But this time there was agreement in the Federal Republic, despite the critical developments, that the direction we had embarked on was correct in principle and with regard to its effect.

The other example for the necessity of talking to each other in difficult times was the Moscow visit of the federal chancellor and myself. We were interested with regard to NATO's two-part decision of December 1979 that, in connection with the decision to close the arms gap, negotiations on medium-range arms should take place as quickly as possible. Since the Soviet side had refused to negotiate for months, we wanted to point out again very clearly that we consider these negotiations as necessary and that the refusal to negotiate in no case would lead to our not implementing the decision on closing the arms gap decision. The fact that the message the Soviet Government addressed to us, indicating that it was prepared to have talks, has had the effect that a meeting between the U.S. secretary of state and the Soviet foreign minister will take place in New York the week after next, shows that the visit took place at the right time.

[Question] You will meet your GDR colleague Mr Fischer in New York on the occasion of the UN General Assembly meeting. Will priority be given to such issues as disarmament? Let me once more return to German-German relations: Will these relations be dominated for the foreseeable future by stagnation, or will there be improvements regardless of the fact that the visit did not come about?

[Answer] We are interested in a further positive development of relations with the GDR and in not letting relations stagnate. In other words, in the time up to the chancellor's visit to the GDR as--a date that cannot be set now--everything must be done through normally available channels to achieve progress in German-German relations.

[Question] How do you assess the interest of the other side?

[Answer] The statements made by Mr Honecker at the Leipzig Fair permit the conclusion that the other side views this problem on principle exactly the same way. As regards fields where progress can be achieved, and whether our views coincide, finding this out is a task to be handled in talks that will be held with the other side.

BRANDT COMMENTS ON EVENTS IN TURKEY

DW151323 Bonn DIE WELT in German 13/14 Sep 80 p 1

[Interview by Bonn correspondent Gottfried Capell with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt--date, place not given]

[Text] WELT: Mr Brandt, Turkey, which is a NATO country, experienced a coup today.

The situation as a whole is most critical. In the light of this overthrow, do you see anything indicating that this is really a temporary situation which could lead to a consolidation of conditions?

Brandt: One can only hope for the latter, but one cannot know, not even 12 hours after the military has taken over without bloodshed, as reports say. One must recall three things: First, last winter the military asked both big parties to take over responsibility together at a critical time. It was clear to me at that time that if this did not work, the military would not accept civil war-like conditions for any lengthy period. Second, the military in Turkey is has a different tradition than the military in certain Latin American countries. After World War I Kemal Ataturk assumed responsibility together with some young officers to help create a new Turkey. He achieved that only up to a certain point. I very much hope that the Kemalist tradition has stayed alive. And third, a personal experience: As the foreign minister of the Federal Republic I was in Ankara at Easter 1969, at a time when the military had taken over for a short time. Their tanks were posted in front of the Foreign Ministry where I had to negotiate with my then colleague. It did not impair our negotiations very much at that time.

WELT: So you see no actual consequences created by the overthrow for the alliance, that is for our approach to Turkey?

Brandt: I do not see consequences for the alliance at the moment. But the news about the arrests of the social democrat Ecevit and other leading representatives of political parties in Turkey fills us with concern. Real stability of a country can develop only in free structure. We hope, therefore, that the military in Turkey will as soon as possible reopen access to democratic conditions. Up to yesterday 216 murders had taken place this month. Much would be won if that were now ended.

WELT: Don't you fear that voices which have already been heard in your party could rise again, claiming that no aid should be given to Turkey for the time being?

Brandt: The reservations among quite a number of my colleagues--I did not share them, but I understood them--will be eliminated to quite some extent once the fury of those groups comes to an end, groups bearing the responsibility for the loss of so many lives, always assuming naturally that events do not end up in new bloodshed.

CDU DEFENSE EXPERT WARNS OF 'EROSION' OF NATO

LD152148 Hamburg DPA in German 2030 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Osnabrueck, 15 Sep (DPA)--In the opinion of CDU/CSU parliamentary group defense expert Dr Manfred Woerner, NATO's strike power is seriously jeopardized by political developments in some of the alliance countries. In an interview for Tuesday's edition of NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG, Woerner spoke of disquieting signs of weakening, with reference to Belgium's refusal to take part in the military maneuvers in the Federal Republic and Turkey and the skeptical attitude of other states. These are indications that NATO's psychological basis is being increasingly destroyed. The peoples' will for defense has obviously seriously suffered during the period of detente. Citizens are no longer ready to bear the burden of warding off threats. The CDU politician strongly warned of the political consequences of this "collapse of awareness" in NATO countries. The beneficiary would clearly be the Soviet Union, to whom it is becoming increasingly obvious that the strong words following the march into Afghanistan are not being followed up by action, that the erosion of NATO's defense capability is continuing.

FOREIGN MINISTRY REACTION TO TURKISH COUP

[Text] As an official reaction from France following the coup which brought a military regime to power in Turkey, Paris hopes that democratic institutions will be rapidly reestablished in that country. A Foreign Ministry spokesman pointed out that France has taken due note of General Evren's remarks to the effect that a civilian government will shortly be reinstalled in Turkey.

VISITING AFRICAN LEADERS COMMENT ON REGIONAL ISSUES

[Text] Zairian head of state General Mobutu, who is on a private visit to Paris, will be received at the Elysee at 1100 on Thursday, 11 September. Mr Giscard d'Estaing will receive Ethiopian Justice Minister [as published] (Kibre Getatchew) at 1530 the same day, and the Ethiopian minister is to hand him a message from Ethiopian head of state General Mengistu.

[Senegalese President]--Senghor, on a private visit to France, was the guest on the French television Channel 1 current affairs program on Tuesday evening, in which he described the situation in the Sahel regions where the desert advances 5 to 6 km each year. The Senegalese president stated: "There are two ways of combatting this: building dams, which costs a great deal and which we are doing within the framework of the organization for the development of the Senegal and Gambia rivers; or planting trees. The more modest means at the disposal of "SOS Sahel" are, however, effective and will enable us to install 3,000 pumps in 60 sectors. This organization's tasks also involve far-reaching education, since it teaches villagers to repair these pumps and to cultivate kitchen gardens."

In addition, Chad Vice President Col Wadal Abdelkader Kamougue, making a short stop in Paris, stated on Tuesday afternoon that he believes the intervention by UN blue helmets in Chad is "futile" since they "will not be enough to restore calm"; he called on "the sons of the country to work together to seek solutions to this problem, which is essentially Chadian." The Chadian vice president admitted that the city of Faya-Largeau, in the north of the country, is now in the hands of the forces under "rebel chief" Hissein Habre, who according to him, is "Neither a patriot nor a nationalist." Colonel Kamougue added: "There can be no question of treating a government and a rebel chief on an equal basis; nobody can force us to accept Hissein Habre as president of the republic."

MITTERRAND ON UNION OF LEFT, PS PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

[Unattributed report on Europe 1 Press Club interview with PS First Secretary Francois Mitterrand on 7 September: "Francois Mitterrand Keeps Up Uncertainty"]

[Text] Mr Francois Mitterrand turned to domestic policy questions by referring to the Union of the Left: "The Union of the Left which I helped to form and which I would like to be able to help to form again...in order to defeat the right." He pointed out that "at no time" did the contract linking the FCF, the PS and the Left Radical Movement imply "the establishment of a communist society in France," adding that "that was perhaps the final reason" for the 1977 break for which he said he holds the PCF responsible.

Mr Mitterrand maintained that the joint program was "not even socialist, and only just social democratic." He added: "Having seen the historical break between the organizations representing the workers, my one wish is to be able to settle this quarrel. Unless this is done we will be doomed to a rightwing government for a long time.... The PCF represents a broad section of the workers. I had discussions with the PCF as soon as it agreed not to try and set up a communist society.... I feel an affinity with anybody who wants to seek a way out of the (country's--LE MONDE note) bad situation, and with whom we can get rid of the people governing us.... I am prepared to reach agreement with any Frenchman who wants to bring about a change in society and build an organized, intelligent and farsighted society. Are there any such people in the RPR? Let them stand up. Are there any such people in the PCF? Of course. Are there any such people in the PCF leadership? There may be but they will have to be quick about making themselves known."

After describing [RPR member] Mr Michel Debre as "a man with convictions and as a respectable political adversary" whose candidacy might "cause considerable confusion in the RPR ranks," Francois Mitterrand mentioned the procedure for appointing the PS candidate for the presidential election. This procedure is due to start on 19 October, the date from which "anybody who wishes to put himself forward as candidate can do so." "That does not mean that you have to rush forward (on that date--LE MONDE note)," he added; "we will soon see who is in a hurry." He also indicated that the PS Executive Committee will fix a date "after which no further prospective candidates will be accepted." He repeated that he has "never expressed the desire or the intention" to stand himself and that the reason the question is put to him "is because the problem is still not settled."

He noted: "Should the main French Socialist leader wear the socialist colors? My political career makes me think that I will be capable of doing the (presidential--LE MONDE note) job.... I am not a man who feeds on or is possessed by obsessive ambition.... I am responsible for socialism in France.... Am I more useful in rallying Socialists and federating them than as head of state? It is important not to confuse these roles: A president cannot be a party leader. That is the first choice I have to make. My second choice is my affair. I believe that I can be of use to my country. Are there others aside from me who could serve their country? I believe there are." Mr Mitterrand then appealed to "the mass of sincere Communists who are aware of what the Communists and Socialists have done together" and who know that he has "never deceived them by allowing them to believe" that he would be favorable "to a communist society in any way whatever."

According to Mitterrand only "irresponsible officials" could "for the sake of tactics and out of a destructive spirit" refuse to transfer Communist votes to the Socialist candidate. He pointed out that the PS is now "faced with the Giscard-Marchais antichange twosome." The Socialist leader stressed that "there can be no question of consenting to an agreement" with those now governing the country and said he is convinced that the Socialist candidate will be able to "rally people to him in the second round" of the presidential election. "I still believe," he remarked, "that the people's automatic reflex will be to vote for the Socialist candidate in the second round." Mr Mitterrand admitted that, once elected, a Socialist president would encounter a problem: that of finding a government majority. However, he added: "If the election (of a Socialist to the presidency--LE MONDE note) comes about the people's enthusiasm will not stop at that." The deputy for Nievre said he thinks that a Socialist president would have to dissolve the National Assembly and that it would then be up to the parties to choose their alliances.

Returning to the possibility of his own candidacy, Mr Mitterrand specified: "Whatever happens I will take action and influence France's future wherever I am. We have to face Soviet expansionism and U.S. (economic--LE MONDE NOTE) imperialism. A president will have to be able to stand firm, make proposals, govern and conciliate.... In the past I thought I could do it since I have twice stood for president. I now feel that I will live up to any position I occupy."

Asked whether Michel Rocard has the qualities a candidate needs, Mr Mitterrand answered: "There are several men and women in the PS who are capable of occupying the highest posts. Not all are in a position to stand and be elected.... Whether the PS candidate is Michel Rocard or someone else, he will have been chosen because we think France deserves that choice.... I am answerable for a great history--past, present and to come.

I feel respect for Michel Rocard, for his intelligence, his vivacity; I like his ambition too--that desire to be someone interests me. I watch him with close attention, with empathy and sometimes with questions which stick in my mind. It is up to him to answer them."
Mr Mitterrand concluded: "The candidate the PS chooses will be my candidate. I will support him. I remember having said--it may have been here, but I was misunderstood--that I will join forces with him. Allow me to repeat that, and you will still have some time in which to wonder what I mean, which will at least give me the pleasure of observing your expressions. You are wondering: 'Who will it be?' Well, just imagine, I know but you do not. That makes all the difference."

L'HUMANITE REPORTS SENTENCING OF SOVIET DISSIDENTS

LD051313 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 29 Aug 80 p 6

[Text] Soviet Orthodox priest Gleb Yakunin was sentenced to 5 years' imprisonment and 5 years' internal exile for a "common law crime" by a Moscow court yesterday. The TASS agency which announced the news specified that he had been accused of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." Western journalists were not allowed to attend the trial which lasted 4 days. Only Gleb Yakunin's wife was allowed into the courtroom. Let us recall that the PCF has specified on many occasions, during similar trials, that in its view no ideological battle can be decided by passing sentences on people.

PCF SENDS 'MESSAGE OF SOLIDARITY' TO SAUDI CP

LD081133 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 30 Aug 80 p 6

[Text] The PCF has sent a message of solidarity to the Communist Party of Saudi Arabia on its fifth anniversary. This message stresses in particular the importance of the MECCA rising and the people's demonstrations in the country's eastern region which took place in November and December 1979. The PCF honors the memory of the martyrs who fell in these struggles and condemns the support given by Giscard's government to the Riyadh dictatorial government. In conclusion, the French Communists wish the Saudi Arabian Communists every success in their battle.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC CP LEADER HAS TALK WITH PCF'S GREMETZ

LD150909 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 27 Aug 80 p 7

[Text] On 25 August, PCF Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz met with Dominican Communist Party Secretary General Narcisco Isa Conde. In the course of a fraternal talk, information on the two parties' national struggles was exchanged. Among other things, Narcisco Isa Conde talked about the results achieved by his party, which is starting a large-scale recruitment campaign, and the 2 year-old government of President Antonio Guzman and his Dominican Revolutionary Party (a member of the Socialist International), whose foreign policy is completely aligned with Washington and whose domestic policy does not rule out repression against the workers, peasants and teachers movements. Maxime Gremetz assured Narcisco Isa Conde again of the French Communists' friendship and solidarity.

ITALY, MALTA EXCHANGE NOTES ON NEUTRALITY STATUS

[Text] Rome, 15 Sep (ANSA)--The agreement under which Italy will guarantee the neutrality of the Mediterranean island of Malta took one step further towards completion today with an exchange of diplomatic notes between the two governments.

According to an Italian Foreign Ministry communique, diplomatic chief Emilio Colombo proceeded to the exchange with Maltese Charge d'Affaires in Rome Joseph Schembri, while Malta's Premier and Foreign Minister Dom Mintoff did likewise with Italian Ambassador Maurizio Battaglini in Valletta.

The documents sanctioning the agreement will now have to be approved by the Rome cabinet in view of final approval by the Italian Parliament, the communique pointed out. The ministry also said that in view of the EEC mandate conferred on Italy in December 1976 to examine Malta's neutrality and a rapid economic and financial package in direct contacts with the island's government, Colombo will report to a meeting of EEC ministers in Brussels this afternoon.

According to Italian Foreign Ministry sources, under the final terms of the agreement, Malta will release a statement on the specific commitments it has accepted to ensure the island's neutrality. These exclude membership of alliances, the admission of foreign military bases or forces on Maltese soil, and permission for the American or Soviet fleets to carry out repairs in Maltese shipyards.

An Italian statement released at the same time will lay down the Rome government's commitments to ensure Maltese neutrality. They include recognition of the island's status as a neutral state, an invitation to all states to respect that status, and the immediate opening of consultations if the island's neutrality is threatened or violated especially in view of Italian diplomatic support before the UN Security Council. These commitments have been tied to a package of economic and financial aid covering Malta's first years as a neutral state. The package includes direct aid, credits on easy terms, and technical assistance. As a further guarantee for Malta's neutrality, this part of the agreement does not rule out assistance of a military nature, which could be decided if it is judged to be necessary by the Italian side as well, in case of a threat against, or violation, of Maltese neutrality.

Italian Foreign Ministry sources were at pains to underscore that the Italian commitments to Malta's neutrality are in line with Rome's policy of making significant and effective contributions to the stability and consolidation of peaceful relations among the Mediterranean countries.

In line with the UN Charter, Italy and Malta will officially inform the organization's Secretariat of the neutrality accord as soon as it has received full approval in conformity with the two states' respective constitutional procedures.

IRAQ'S AD-DURI COMMENTS ON RELATIONS WITH ITALY, IRAN

[Text] Rome, 15 Sep (ANSA)--One of the results of the "sincere friendship" between Italy and Iraq is that the Middle Eastern nation will, within the limits of its possibilities, supply Italy with all the crude it needs. In return for this Iraq demands respect--which has already been confirmed--of the economic, political, technological and military agreements signed between the two countries. This was the gist of the statements Iraqi Vice President of the Revolutionary Command Council 'Izzat Ibrahim ad-Duri made in a press conference here today.

'Izzat, who has been heading a high-ranking delegation on an official visit to Italy since Friday, said that Italo-Iraqi relations are "excellent". The Iraqi official, whose post corresponds to premier, gave a particularly moderate picture of his nation's foreign policy. He denied that Iran and Iraq are at war. He voiced a positive judgment of the military coup d'etat in Turkey and he said that his nation's energy policy is "opposed to both raising the price of crude and cutting back production". 'Izzat said that Italo-Iraqi relations are "to the advantage of the two nations and of peace in the world".

The vice president of the Revolutionary Command Council voiced appreciation for the role Italy plays in the European Economic Community in favor of "stability" in the Middle East and Mediterranean basin. To this end, he cited the Community's position on the Middle East and the projected Italo-Maltese agreement on the island's neutrality.

On the basis of these premises, and in light of Italy's appreciation for "the incisive and new courses of Iraqi diplomacy" directed at creating greater stability in the Middle East, 'Izzat and Italian Premier Cossiga acknowledge in their encounter yesterday "close position on several points and total agreement on others. Steps were taken for further improving the already excellent relations between the two countries", he said. 'Izzat said Iraq is interested in Italy and Europe because of their "independent role and the positiolns they have taken on the Palestinian issue." The Iraqi official replied to many questions on his nation's oil policy, an issue particularly dear to Italy which purchases more than a fifth of its oil from Iraq.

'Izzat said that, as a result of the great development of bilateral relations in all fields, Iraq is willing to comply with Italy's requests. "Iraq's possibilities, because of other contracts are limited. Despite this we look with favor on countries that want to have excellent relations with us and we are also willing to make some sacrifices. In return, we ask for a similar attitude, particularly respect of all commitments made in every field".

The Iraqi official also gave reassurances about the problem of prices. He said that his country is opposed to continuous hikes and also to cutting back production "unless it is necessary to defend national sovereignty". He then recalled that for the last two years Iraq has been selling oil to 25 poor developing nations at 1978 prices and has granted them loans without interest to the tune of two billion dollars.

With respect to the military coup in Turkey, 'Izzat said that "it is an internal affair of that nation" and voiced the hope that "it will restore stability to a neighbour with which we have good-neighbour relations".

He then denied that an Iraqi military jet attacked the helicopter on which Iranian President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr and Prime Minister Mohammad 'Ali were traveling near the Iraqi-Iranian border. He also denied that the two nations are "in a state of war". 'Izzat confirmed, however, that in the last three days the Iraqi Army is gradually "recouping" territory which Iran had occupied in the past and which the shah had pledged in 1975 to give back on the basis of the Algiers agreements.

"Ten days ago we sent a message to Iran asking for the return (of the territory) within one week. When the deadline went by we decided to take the territory back and we think the operation should be over before the end of the week". In conclusion, 'Izzat said the mentality of "the turbaned men" in power in Iran is "irresponsible and backward".

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON CHILEAN REFERENDUM

[Text] Rome, 15 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian Government issued a statement over the weekend criticizing the "referendum" imposed on the Chilean population last Thursday by the Santiago dictatorship.

The statement said that the Chilean people were summoned to voting booths "by the ruling totalitarian regime" for a referendum which the dictatorship "interpreted as a show of approval" of the status quo.

"Such a form of voting has nothing to do with free elections in a democratic system.

"It is evident that there was no guarantee of the people's desire for free expression, which is in fact oppressed by the current governing methods in Chile which do not allow a normal dialectic between parties and the possibility to present to the electorate their programs, as would happen in a regime based on principles of liberty".

BERLINGUER ON RECENT EVENTS IN CHILE, POLAND, TURKEY

AU150912 Rome ANSA in English 0835 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Text] Bologna, 15 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer voiced his party's solidarity for the Chilean people after last week's "farcical" referendum and for the Bolivian people after the military coup d'etat in July, in a speech delivered Sunday at the close of the nationale "Festa Del L'UNITA" here.

The two-week festival is held annually to raise funds for the party's paper L'UNITA.

Berlinguer also focused on the current situation in El Salvador and Guatemala and explained the reason why Italian Communists are concerned about reactionary regimes in such distant nations.

The PCI leader said they are concerned because their internationalist spirit is not limited by geographical or ideological barriers.

"But they are concerned also because too many Italian democrats forget about such burning realities or seem to accept them as unpleasant but, on the whole, inevitable.

"The same thing seems to be happening towards the military coup d'etat in Turkey.

"In Brussels, the NATO leaders appear in no way concerned about the elimination of all democratic guarantees in that country and let their satisfaction be known".

The Italian Communist leader asked what the Italian Government will do and say about the coup in Turkey, one of its fellow members in NATO.

With respect to the recent events in Poland, Berlinguer said that Italian Communists are closely following developments, "appreciating the positieve aspects and balanced manner in which all the parties acted in recent weeks.

"However", he added, "let us not forget the complexity and gravity of the economic, social and political problems which must be solved and the unknown consequences inherent in the process that has begun--unknowns which are also linked to the international situation".

CUNHAL INTERVIEWED ON ELECTIONS, POLISH EVENTS

LD121047 Lisbon DIAIRO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 1 Sep 80 pp 7-8

[Dinis de Abreu and Simoes Ilharco interview with PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal: "PCP Can See No Substantial Reasons for Council of Revolution's Disappearance"--date and place of interview not given]

[Excerpts] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: It can be seen from the United People's Alliance [APU] lists that the number of the Portuguese Democratic Movement/Democratic Electoral Commission [MDP/CDE] or independent candidates in positions deemed favorable for election has increased. Does this indicate greater confidence on the part of the PCP in its strength or greater openness in drawing up the lists?

Alvaro Cunhal: It indicates greater confidence on the part of the PCP in its strength and in its influence, which has been increased by the espousal of the party's viewpoints, policy and conduct by many people who might hitherto have hesitated to join us on lists of candidates. It in no way indicates a reduction of our party's influence or of the sphere of acceptance of its viewpoints. It also seems to me that the increase in the number of independents (they total 60) indicates that many people in other parties, without belonging to the PCP or the MDP/CDE, are now convinced that a democratic solution in our country necessarily requires strong PCP participation.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In the last elections you said that the Democratic Alliance would not have a parliamentary majority, and this was a mistake on your part. Do you believe that this time you are in danger of being mistaken again, in predicting defeat for the Democratic Alliance?

Alvaro Cunhal: Of course. You can never be 100-percent certain in forecasts; any forecast is fallible. Many people were mistaken in their forecasts with respect to the last elections. But there are, however, other reasons and other indications which cause us to forecast defeat for the reactionary alliance and therefore to feel confident that those parties which represented a minority of the electorate even in 1979, the Social Democratic Party [PSD] and the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] will be left in a minority in the Assembly of the Republic. Is there a danger of my being mistaken? We are working to ensure that we are not mistaken and proceeding from the idea that, more important than the generally fabricated forecasts and opinion polls, it is necessary for the Portuguese democrats to work to ensure that this result is achieved, providing a democratic majority in the assembly and defeating the reactionary forces.

Issue of Majority

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Since you have declared yourself opposed to the formation of minority governments, do you deem possible an agreement between the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS] and the APU, thus creating a leftwing majority which you have always advocated?

Alvaro Cunhal: The fundamental aim in the coming elections is to reduce the reactionary parties (the PSD and the CDS) to a minority in the Assembly of the Republic. The essential aim is to stop this offensive which the reactionary forces are conducting against the democratic system itself, unlawful and subversive activity again with a parliamentary majority.

Once those parties have been reduced to a parliamentary minority, the democratic forces will be in the majority, although this does not mean that this numerical majority will necessarily and automatically result in a political and real majority, since events and history have proven that this is not the case, such as the Socialist Party [PS]-PCP numerical majority in previous elections, because there were preferences on the part of the PS for alliance with the right and not with the PCP.

For this reason we do not claim that defeat for the Democratic Alliance in the legislative elections, even though it will mean a democratic majority, will also necessarily and automatically mean the formation of a real democratic majority, subsequently set up so as to create the constitutional support for the formation of a democratic government. What we do believe is that stopping the Democratic Alliance's offensive will create prospects for seeking a democratic solution which will secure majority support in the Assembly of the Republic, and we will be prepared to consider the various hypotheses for a government which will be based on the numerical democratic majority resulting from the elections.

DIARO DE NOTICIAS: Let us suppose that nobody has an absolute majority in the coming elections and assume that there is an FRS government (because the Democratic Alliance will govern only if it has an absolute majority). Would you be prepared to give that government parliamentary support, even without the Communists taking part in it?

Alvaro Cunhal: I believe that the seeking of support does not follow but rather precedes the formation of the government, so there is a chronological inaccuracy here. As we forecast, after the Democratic Alliance has been defeated, the president will consider the formation of a new government, and for this, according to the constitution, he will consult the parties and the council of the revolution.

There will then be the possibility of an exchange of views with the president of the republic on the formation of the new government. The right course is not to form the government and then ask the PCP whether it is prepared to support it. We are prepared to analyze with the PS and other democratic forces the hypotheses which may lead to the creation of a democratic solution.

Participation in Government

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: And will the PCP seek to participate in the government?

Alvaro Cunhal: In this connection our stance is as follows: The adoption of a national policy which will resolve the nation's problems will be very difficult without Communist participation in the government. Our party has a unique position with respect to influence among the working classes and its capacity for mobilization and organization. It is a party which is particularly well prepared for active participation in resolving the nation's problems. In our opinion, the PCP's participation in the government is a very important factor for consolidating democracy and safeguarding the democratic gains.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But would it or would it not endorse an FRS government?

Alvaro Cunhal: I am saying nothing. We will see. What I can tell you is that we are prepared to discuss all possible solutions with the PS. Your hypothesis of the formation of a PS government which would then seek support from the PCP is abstract and unrealistic.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: We believe that at another juncture the PS has already asked the PCP to give a government formed by it parliamentary support.

Alvaro Cunhal: I remember that; it was in 1977. But I can tell you no more. The PS (or the FRS) on its own is no alternative.

Wasted and Useless Votes

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: You mentioned wasted votes. Curiously, the PS secretary general says that the PCP is not a government alternative (is outside the area of government), and that the left, in order to govern, will only be able to do so through the FRS, so that voting for the APU also means wasting votes. What is your opinion?

Alvaro Cunhal: In the first place, with respect to determining the parties which are in the area of government or outside it, it is not the parties which do this but our people, through the support which they give them. Second, we do not say that the APU is a democratic alternative on its own, but we assert that the FRS is not, either. In the elections to the constituent assembly, the Socialists had 38 percent, then in the legislative elections they fell to 34 percent, while in the last elections they had only 27 percent.

The trend is toward decline. But even if at best they achieved the poll which they had initially, when the right's useful vote was for the PS, in 1975 and 1976, they would be very far from an absolute majority. To assert, as Dr Mario Soares did, that the FRS will achieve an absolute majority, is a deception of the electorate. It is to mislead it. Neither the APU nor the FRS is in isolation capable of being an alternative, so that an agreement between the APU and the FRS with a view to forming a majority which will serve as a support for a democratic government becomes even more justified and necessary. Despite the reservations which we have with respect to the PS policy, which has already been strongly criticized by us, we continue to advocate an agreement between Socialists and Communists.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Is it not frustrating for the PCP not to represent a government alternative?

Alvaro Cunhal: There is no isolated force which is an alternative. The CDS called itself the 1976 alternative. Its entire campaign was to that effect. Poor fellows, they were no alternative on their own. And today the Democratic Alliance has a parliamentary majority because it represents the sum total of two parties. And they are two parties which are so different that the PS and its secretary general, Mario Soares, have begun to insinuate the possibility of a breakup of the Democratic Alliance in the event of defeat, and the possibility--and this is graver, worse and more dangerous--of a policy of alliances of the PS with the PSD. With the APU, not at all. With the PSD, yes possibly. This seems to us extremely dangerous, because the nation's political forces are divided into two big halves: reactionary forces, which are seeking to carry out a coup in stages, and democratic forces (principally the PS and the PCP). We believe that the alliances which are natural in view of the people's masses' aims and aspirations and respect for the election results must be delimited by this division.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: You have insisted on the dismissal of the government, but your appeals have produced no response in Belem Palace. Do you still believe that the president of the republic could dismiss this government before the elections?

Alvaro Cunhal: Before answering this question, I would like to emphasize that we insist on the government's dismissal for three basic reasons: first of all, its subversive policy. It respects neither the constitution nor democratic legality. It is a policy of destruction. It is seeking to destroy our people's great gains, such as the agrarian reform and the nationalization measures. It is assailing basic rights enshrined in the constitution. Second, it does not guarantee the democratic nature of the elections. Third, the prime minister's involvement in a financial scandal. But it has neither scruples nor shame, and the situation is persisting, assailing the state's dignity.

As to whether we do or do not cherish hopes of the president of the republic dismissing the government, this is not the basic issue. The essential thing is that a responsible political force such as ours must point out to our people the reasons why this government cannot continue. And if the government is not dismissed or does not resign by the time of the elections, it will be the people who will dismiss it through the ballot box at the elections.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Turning to the revision of the constitution, do you regard the constitution as untouchable? For instance, do you advocate the abolition of the Council of the Revolution or its retention?

Alvaro Cunhal: We believe that the Portuguese constitution is a good constitution which reflects the fundamental changes effected through the April revolution. It may be considered that some articles of the constitution have more of a programmatic than an institutional nature, as is the case with all the constitutions in the world. But we are in favor of revision within the lawful parameters.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In your opinion, which points should be revised?

Alvaro Cunhal: In the first place, we believe that there are points which should not be revised. That is the essential thing. And there are those who wish to revise the constitution unconstitutionally in order to actually destroy it. We cannot forget that there are material limits to the revision. The big estates cannot be restored, and the government is already restoring them. The monopolies cannot be restored, and the government has already attempted to restore them. The principle of proportional representation cannot be changed, and the government has already sought to change it through the amendments to the electoral law....

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: We reiterate: In the PCP's opinion, which points should be revised?

Alvaro Cunhal: We believe that the entire allocation of powers among the assembly, the president and the government should be revised, and that there are aspects which, without changing the essence of the constitution, it is better to revise on the basis of experience: for instance, whether the assembly's supervisory activity with respect to the government should or should not increase. With respect to the state bodies' major powers, we believe that there should be no change.

Events in Poland

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: At the international level, how do you view the strikes in Poland? Do you regard the workers' strike movement as just?

Alvaro Cunhal: There has been, above all, great speculation concerning the strikes in Poland. And it is curious to note that there is sometimes a campaign asserting that there is no right to strike in the socialist countries, emphasizing that there are no strikes because this right does not exist. But when strikes occur, there is immediately an attempt to give these strikes a political significance which they do not have. Our comrade Gierek has already said that he will take the workers' demands into account. It should also be stressed that, contrary to the expectation created by a certain section of the Portuguese and Western press, no repressive action against the strikers has occurred. The campaign which is being conducted is aimed at transforming these strikes not into strike movements but into movements of opposition to the socialist system. It is the traditional anticommunist campaign.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But the strikers are demanding reforms in the system in their manifesto, demanding freedom of expression, the right to strike and trade union freedom....

Alvaro Cunhal: These rights and freedoms are institutionalized in socialist Poland. Certain shortcomings and mistakes in trade union life have been acknowledged by the Polish leaders in relation to the current strikes.

Imprisonment of Dissidents

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you not fear that the strikes reflect a crisis in the system itself?

Alvaro Cunhal: No, it is not a crisis of the system. Those who are saying this, who are presenting the strikes as opposition to the regime and who are even talking about the imminence of an insurrectionary movement, what would they say with respect to capitalist countries, where there are strikes involving millions of workers? In our country, the outbreak of strikes is in order to protest against government policy, but the democratic system is not called into question. The Portuguese workers support democracy.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How would you view a Soviet intervention in Poland at Gierek's request or otherwise?

Alvaro Cunhal: That hypothesis is absurd. It does not arise. The Poles will resolve their own problems.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: And the imprisonment of dissidents: What is your opinion of that?

Alvaro Cunhal: This word "dissidents" serves for everything and something more. People who openly break the socialist countries' laws, call for foreign intervention and maintain contacts and collaboration with other countries' intelligence services have frequently been described as "dissidents" by imperialist and reactionary propaganda. We do not know the people who are said to have been recently arrested.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you view the hegemonic struggle for control of influence in the world between the USSR and the United States?

Alvaro Cunhal: We are opposed to the policy of blocs. The conflict has obvious reasons. There are two worlds. Confrontation is natural, but confrontation stemming from the peoples' achievements and aspirations is one thing, and confrontation which tends to be military is another, and one which we utterly condemn.

Foreign Policy

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you assess the foreign policy actively conducted by Helmut Schmidt and Giscard d'Estaing?

Alvaro Cunhal: It is clear that I do not agree with Helmut Schmidt or with Giscard d'Estaing, but in terms of independent foreign policy I do not regard as negative Giscard's and Schmidt's stances with respect to Carter's pressures. Moreover, states' policies should always be independent. I only regret that our own is so subordinate to the United States.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: You talk about independent policies, but there are those who regard your party as being among those most dependent on Moscow....

Alvaro Cunhal: That is untrue. Our party has an experience which few have. During the great years of our reorganization we were virtually isolated from the international communist movement. We experienced a very difficult stage in 1938-1939--the political police and the fascist repression succeeded in reaching most of our cadres--and when the reorganization of 1940-1941 took place at the height of the world war, the PCP was isolated until 1947 from all the other Communist parties. When the Communist International was dissolved in 1943 the PCP was isolated. And so we remained throughout the war, making only a few contacts with our Spanish comrades. We became accustomed to resolving our policy and our affairs on our own.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But there are those who assert that you consult Moscow to learn what decision to make....

Alvaro Cunhal: We have no hotline to Moscow. We are the most independent of the Portuguese parties. We think for ourselves and make the decisions which we deem best for the interests of the workers and of Portuguese democracy. The rest is untrue. It is the usual slander.

CDS SEES EANES AS 'PCP'S REAL' PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

[Text] The Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] has challenged the Socialist Party [PS] to make public the contents of the political contract negotiated with General Ramalho Eanes with a view to the latter's candidacy for reelection as president of the republic. The challenge is contained in the final communique released by the CDS Executive Committee, in which the CDS also urges the PS to "announce publicly before the election what it intends to do with regard to possible cooperation with the PCP."

"The CDS challenges the PS to state publicly the essential contents of the contract, and I hope at least that, when General Ramalho Eanes formally announces his stage-managed candidacy for reelection, he will explain to the Portuguese people the nature of his links, connections and commitments with respect to the PS." This is stated in the CDS Executive Committee's communique, which focuses on the subject of Ramalho Eanes' candidacy for reelection. As far as the CDS is concerned, Eanes "will be the PCP's real candidate." This is because, according to the CDS leaders' analysis, "the PS government strategy presupposes PCP cooperation," and the same applies to its "presidential strategy." The centrists conclude that this in fact "is acknowledged by the PCP secretary general when he admits that the Communists will vote for General Ramalho Eanes in the second round of the election."

In its analysis of the present political situation the CDS emphasizes "the increasing aggressiveness of the PS-PCP and Republican and Socialist Front-United People's Alliance [FRS-APU] opposition," which contrasts with "the government's constructive serenity." In the CDS' opinion "the socialist and communist radicalism stems from the evident lack of popular response to the opposition's attacks."

Pointing to PS and PCP "methods, topics of attack and defamatory campaigns," the CDS explains that "it does not commit the political affront of identifying the PS and its allies with the PCP's Stalinism. The PS is and will continue to be a democratic party even when it uses techniques as ethically condemnable as those to which it has been resorting. But the CDS must recognize that the socialists' and communists' radicalism has the same origin and the same significance. The origin lies in the realization of the successes achieved by the Democratic Alliance government among the voters. The significance lies in an inevitable attempt at a future, postelection government agreement between socialists and communists. Otherwise the kind of attitudes that the socialists have been adopting would be entirely illogical."

The CDS regards an understanding between socialists and communists as "an inevitable reality" in the "highly unlikely event of the FRS-APU group gaining a majority of deputies in the coming election." The PS, the CDS adds, "can therefore make only one serious proposal to the voters--that it will govern, directly or indirectly, with PCP backing in the event of the Democratic Alliance's failing to win an absolute majority of deputies."

CSCE 12 SEP SESSION ADJOURNED AFTER 10 MINUTES

[Text] The morning session of the preparatory meeting of the Madrid conference lasted 10 minutes. The session began at 1100 this morning under the chairmanship of the head of the Belgian delegation and, in the absence of speakers, was adjourned almost immediately until next Monday.

The postponement is reportedly justified by the fact that the informal working document on the third point of the agenda--which refers to the establishment of the timetable for the work of the principal conference--is still at the preparatory stage on the part of the nonaligned group responsible for drawing it up.

SPAIN'S CSCE DELEGATE INTERVIEWED ON PROSPECTS, GOALS

LD151543 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 9 Sep 80 p 3

[Pablo Sebastian interview in Washington with leader of Spanish delegation to Madrid CSCE conference Javier Ruperez: "Basic Problems Will Not Be Broached During First Stage"--date not specified]

[Excerpt] Question: What are the CSCE conference's prospects at the present time of international tension?

Answer: Despite the existing difficulties, I believe the prospects for the progress of the conference are, paradoxically, good, principally because of the opportuneness of the moment, which could turn the Madrid meeting into the center of attention of the major East-West negotiations and into a kind of barometer of detente. I believe that this expectation has been contributed to, for instance, by the course of the crisis in Poland, which has fortunately remained an issue of Polish domestic politics. In my opinion, the meeting's prospects of success or failure will depend on all the participants. In any case, the fact that the conference is meeting under the present circumstances already constitutes a far from negligible initial result.

Question: What is the political scope or significance of the preparatory stage?

Answer: The so-called substantive or basic issues will not be broached during this initial meeting. The political issues are relegated to the conference proper. Nevertheless, important issues, which will influence the future of the political debates, such as the timetable, the balance between the stage of analysis and that of conclusions, and even the possibility of the conference continuing later in another country, will be decided now.

Question: Won't there in fact be a debate about the balance between the first and the second stage--something like a conflict between the raising of issues such as Afghanistan and human rights and the quest for new security and military confidence-building measures?

Answer: Well, during the political stage, implementation of the Helsinki Final Act will be analyzed, and at that time all countries can make what references they wish to issues such as Afghanistan or human rights. I believe the way in which these references are made will be important to achieving some results in the second part.

Question: Might not the Soviets demand the exclusion of the Afghanistan issue, because it is not European territory?

Answer: The Soviets may attempt to do so, but this issue concerns the conference, and this is clear from the Helsinki Final Act. Moreover, there is no political or human way to prevent a country from referring to it. [paragraph contines]

On the other hand, neither can the possibility be ruled out of the East bloc countries responding to issues such as this and denunciations concerning human rights with slander issues concerning ethnic minorities, racial problems or disarmament problems.

Question: What will Spain's stance be in this debate?

Answer: Spain has held talks, and will continue to hold them, with the Western bloc and, in particular, with the EEC and NATO countries. We will align ourselves with the West's viewpoints, although, as hosts, we will also seek and promote balanced stances for the conference's successful progress and conclusion.

Gibraltar and NATO

Question: Might not some country accuse Spain of failure to implement the Helsinki Final Act in matters such as freedom of information, minorities or, for instance, the issue of free movement of people and ideas in relation to the closed border with Gibraltar?

Answer: I do not believe that this will happen or could happen. The Gibraltar issue is currently under negotiation with Britain. Moreover, it is subject to an international treaty and its obligatory implementation, as is required by the Helsinki agreements themselves, which also mention states' territorial integrity; and although they also refer to the inviolability of borders, it must be pointed out that this is not of a final nature, because they do not need to be eternal. Moreover, Spain already voiced a reservation in this connection on the Gibraltar issue in Helsinki.

Question: And might not Spain's possible entry into NATO be used by the USSR as a response to the Afghanistan issue with respect to the nonenlargement of military blocs?

Answer: This issue could arise in defense policy issues, but it would not have much justification, since the Helsinki Final Act recognizes the right of all countries to conclude bilateral or multilateral agreements, and, more specifically, at the end of the first principle it refers to the right of nations which so desire to join military blocs freely. I believe that this issue could have greater significance at a disarmament conference but that under no circumstances will it affect Spain's sovereign decision.

Question: Last, what tangible results could emerge from the Madrid meeting?

Answer: This is difficult to predict at present. For the moment, the fact that the conference is meeting is already something. Moreover, the place and date of a future meeting could be agreed on in Madrid.

CUBAN FOREIGN MINISTER MALMIERCA ARRIVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT

LD161335 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 10 Sep 80 pt 1 p 4

[Text] Cuba wants to expand its joint trade with Denmark, including the purchase of more ships from Danish shipyards, but the condition is that Denmark increase its purchases in Cuba, first and foremost of sugar, which is the Latin American state's most important export.

Cuban Foreign Minister Isidoro Malmierca said this at a press conference on Tuesday in Copenhagen during his official visit to Denmark.

Cuba has in the past bought several vessels from Helsingoer shipyard, for example, which Malmierca will visit on Wednesday. The foreign minister held talks on Tuesday with Prime Minister Ankar Jorgensen and Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen.

With the Danish Government representatives Malmierca discussed, among other things, a number of international questions, including the situation in Afghanistan. In this connection the Cuban foreign minister said that Cuba is a supporter of a solution that could ensure the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

Cuba has no military advisers in the country, but a couple of advisers at the Cuban Embassy in Afghanistan have advised the Afghan military on certain questions.

DANISH DEFENSE CHIEF ARRIVES FOR TALKS

LD151453 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 10 Sep 80 p 12

[Text] Danish Defense Chief Gen Knud Jorgensen began a visit to Norway on Monday afternoon and was met by Defense Chief Sverre Hamre. Jorgensen will stay in Norway until Friday, when he will return to Copenhagen from Bergen.

Yesterday morning the two defense chiefs held talks on questions of joint interest. Gen Sverre Hamre was probably briefed on the Danish proposal for a new defense agreement, which has recently been the object of considerable political controversy in Copenhagen--after it became known that the U.S. defense secretary had criticized the Danish plane in two letters to Danish Defense Minister Poul Sogaard.

General Jorgensen for his part was probably briefed on the Norwegeian plan for stockpiling heavy American equipment in Trondelag. Yesterday the Danish defense chief was also briefed at defense high command on current defense problems, before he traveled to Kirkenes, where he visited the garrison at Soer-Varanger. Today he will visit the area on the border with the Soviet Union, and then Vardoe and Kautokeino. He will also visit the Hardufoss area, in connection with the "barfrost exercise" before traveling to Bergen.

DEFENSE CHIEFS ON REQUIREMENTS FOR CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING

[Knut Falchenberg report: "North Norway Must Be Reinforced"]

[Excerpts] "From a military viewpoint it is entirely acceptable that the government now seems to be going in for contingency stockpiles of materials for a U.S. Marine force in central Norway, but a condition of this is that the defenses in the north of the country are strengthened," Defense Chief Sverre Hamre told AFTENPOSTEN.

Hamre said that his understanding of the matter was that the government, as part of an overall plan, would strengthen defenses in northern Norway by sorting materiel for a Norwegian brigade group. In addition there are a number of other measures, such as the further development of the transport system for military shipments between southern and northern Norway. He also said that the question of where this Norwegian brigade group will come from has not yet been discussed.

[Question] How large is the American force which, it now seems, will stockpile its heavier equipment in the Troendelag area?

[Answer] I cannot now say how many men are being talked about, but a U.S. Marine brigade comprises both air and land forces. The extent to which American helicopters will be part of the stockpiles is a question that will naturally be discussed in the talks with the Americans. Such talks will also clarify how a force of U.S. Marines with their heavy materiels stored in the Trondelag area will be able to be transported--or to transport itself--to areas of deployment in northern Norway.

[Question] Does such stockpiling conflict with Norwegian Military base policy?

[Answer] Not as far as I can see. The Storting has itself said that contingency stockpiling is necessary in order to make our military base policy credible.

[Question] Will Norway have any economic burdens in connection with contingency stockpiling?

[Answer] I would think that the initial depots will be financed jointly. I cannot imagine anything different, Hamre said.

He told AFTENPOSTEN that Norway already has contingency stockpiles of materiels at several military airfields, some of a considerable size. West Germany also has stockpiles of materiel for its marines in Norway. Further stockpiling would fall within this pattern, the defense chief said.

Likely Stockpile Locations

[Text] "If Trondelag is the place that is finally chosen for the contingency stockpiling of heavy allied military materiel, these will have to be stored alongside an airfield complex. Those which primarily seem best suited are Varnes and Orlandet, and also Namsos to a certain extent," Defense Chief Gen Sverre Hamre told AFTENPOSTEN.

Hamre said that he would imagine that the materiel would be stored not within the boundaries of the individual airfields but within easy reach of them. Namsos airfield is considerably smaller than those in Varnes and Orlandet, and the defense chief said that it was difficult to say today whether Namsos airfield will be extended. But this would at any rate serve internal communications aircraft.

The defense chief sees the airfields of Bardufoss, Andoya and Evenes as a restricted airfield complex in northern Norway, and Varnes, Orlandet and Namsos as the next natural complex to the south. If Trondelag is chosen, these places would select themselves.

Materiel To Be Stored

[Text] The U.S. defense equipment that the government is now planning to stockpile in Trondelag will be used by a reduced brigade of marines, that is, by around 10,000 men. The government stresses that the equipment will be under Norwegian control.

When asked on Norsk Radio Og Krigkasting [Norwegian state broadcasting service] yesterday evening what kind of equipment this would mean, Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg said: "In addition to fuel, ammunition and dried foods, there would be 18-24 guns, 12 antitank battery transporters, trucks and two batteries of Hawk missiles to defend airfields." The minister expressed his reservations with regard to the details, because the matter has not been dealt with fully.

The minister also said that it was still not known what contingency stockpiling in Trondelag and the reinforcement of Norwegian stores in northern Norway would cost. "There is talk of stockpiling equipment for a combined regiment in the north and for a reduced American brigade in Trondelag. This plan will be more expensive than simply bringing a reduced brigade from the United States into the north," Defense Minister Stoltenberg said.

ARBEIDERBLADET SUPPORTS DECISION ON CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING

LD151519 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 8 Sep 80 p 4

[Editorial: "A Policy for Peace"]

[Text] The work that the government has already done on the question of the contingency stockpiling of heavy U.S. military equipment in Norway, and the decisions that have been made, are the basis on which the government will negotiate further with the U.S. authorities. On the basis of a comprehensive investigation it is the government's view that such stockpiles ought to be sited in Trondelag and that this will be combined with an expansion of military stockpiles for Norwegian forces in northern Norway. The negotiations with the Americans will show whether it is possible to reach a result that is satisfactory for both parties on the basis of this decision.

The government has had to bear considerable criticism for the way in which the matter has been handled up to now. This is essentially due to expectations that the treatment of the matter, including the phase now behind us, was to have taken a long time. This criticism was also heard at the Labor Party's National Executive meeting in Tonsberg yesterday. The criticism contains no desire to modify the government's obvious duty to reach decisions on important foreign and security policy questions. We see the criticism rather as a wish that the factual basis for the government's decision should be subject to broader discussion and analysis within the party's organization. The resolution adopted at the National Executive meeting means that this will now happen. The National Executive will thus hold its final discussion of the matter at the same time as the government will be able to present the possible results of the negotiations with the Americans. But such an arrangement does not alter the government's duty to be the final body to reach a decision on the basis of its own independent judgment.

Foreign and security policy have been the main topics at two Labor Party National Executive meetings in the last year. As well as the Tonsberg meeting there was also the Lillehammer meeting last fall. Here it was the government's stand on the modernization of NATO's nuclear arms in Europe that was under discussion. In both these debates, and especially in the debate in Tonsberg yesterday, great interest was expressed on all questions regarding detente, disarmament and peace. Deep insight into these questions was also revealed by a number of National Executive members. This is in line with the most positive political currents one can find in Western Europe, and also to an extent in Eastern Europe today. Especially interesting is the role that West Germany plays in this context. Many look to Federal Chancellor Schmidt today as the architect of a new policy of detente and peace.

For its part the Labor Party has long been interested in these questions, and has initiated close contacts and collaboration with the West German Social Democrats and their leader. It was also a Norwegian initiative to have attach to the NATO modernization resolution a resolution on negotiations, which gives cause for hope that the new nuclear arms will not need to be deployed. Brezhnev's letters to prime minister Nordli and Labor Party Chairman Reiulf Steen among others confirm that the Soviet Union is now willing to take part in such negotiations. There are also other clear signs that the process of detente in Europe, brought to a sudden end by the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan at the beginning of the year, can now start up again.

In our part of the world, too, all people live with a burning hope for peace. We believe that the interest in these questions now manifesting itself more and more strongly within the Labor Party will be an important contribution to the peace process. And this will therefore be in keeping with some of the workers movement's best traditions.

For our part we would stress that there is no contradiction between an active peace policy and a relatively simple question like contingency stockpiling. Contingency stockpiling is a question of maintaining that readiness for action that we already possess. It does not represent any threat to any foreign nation and is exclusively defensive. Contingency stockpiles mean that Norwegian authorities have more time when considering whether to call in reinforcements and that the chances of thus avoiding so-called "false crises" are greater. In a given situation this in itself can be an important contribution to peace.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON RESUMPTION OF INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

Government Interlocutor Ioannidhis

NC151844 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 15 Sep 80

In a statement this evening, Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot representative to the talks, said that the Greek Cypriot side believed in finding a just and viable solution to the Cypriot problem in the talks procedure. He also said that he would exert every possible effort in this direction. He said that he would go to the talks with seriousness, ready to discuss all aspects of the Cypriot problem with good faith, good disposition and the willingness and determination for a positive and constructive dialogue. We know, he added, that the path that leads to peace and reconciliation is not easy. However, reconciliation is necessary for finding a common, acceptable solution for both communities.

Finally, Ioannidhis stressed that a substantive and calm dialogue remained the only hope for resuming normality in Cyprus.

Denktas Remarks

TA091756 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 9 Sep 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the Turkish Cypriot side is approaching the intercommunal talks with good will and wishes to successfully conclude these talks.

Talking to reporters about the visit of Turkish Foreign Ministry Secretary General Ambassador Ilter Turkmen, Denktas expressed great pleasure over Turkmen's visit to Cyprus and said: During this visit, we briefed Turkmen extensively on our attitude during the talks. We confirmed that Turkey and the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus fully agree that the problems can be solved under the auspices of UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim and within the framework of the principles agreed upon by the two sides. We are going to the talks with good will and hope that they will end successfully.

DENKTAS CALLS NEW KIPRIANOU CABINET UNCONSTITUTIONAL

[Text] President Rauf Denktas today called to his office the UN special representative in Cyprus, Gobbi, and his adviser, Gorge, and told them that the new Kiprianou cabinet runs counter to the 1960 constitution and that the Greek Cypriot administration cannot represent the whole of the island based on this constitution.

In a statement after the hour-long meeting with the UN representatives, Denktas said the Turkish Cypriot community has for years been telling the United Nations as well as other organizations that the Greek Cypriot administration does not represent the whole of the island and that the Greek Cypriot community, which has been ignoring the 1960 constitution since 1963, oppressed the Turkish Cypriot community for years. Noting that he had informed the UN representatives that the new cabinet formed by Kiprianou is not constitutional, even in southern Cyprus, Denktas added that Kiprianou is heading an administration which is incompatible with the 1960 constitution and that Kiprianou is trying to usurp Turkish Cypriot rights under the guise of a constitutional government based on a constitution which, when he finds necessary, he claims is dead and buried. Denktas said that in accordance with the 1960 constitution, the 10 cabinet ministers—two of whom should be Turkish Cypriots—should be appointed with the consent of the Turkish and Greek Cypriot officials. He added that, however, this situation has long been ignorged. He noted that the current Kiprianou cabinet is comprised of 11 ministers and that the consent of any Turkish Cypriot official was not and could not be sought given the current realities.

Denktas continued: The current situation is sufficient to show that the administration headed by Kiprianou is not and cannot be the government of the whole of Cyprus. Such a government cannot speak on the behalf of the whole island. It cannot represent the island in the forthcoming UN meeting. It cannot speak on behalf of the Turkish Cypriot community. This institution, which has usurped the [word indistinct] of the government and which continues its attacks against the Turkish Cypriot government and the Turkish Cypriot community will soon sit at the negotiating table to solve the Cyprus issue. I find it beneficial to state that we cannot accept any institution that poses as the Cyprus Government at the negotiating table. The Turkish and Greek Cypriot negotiators will discuss social problems. We will not accept anything else. We will inform the United Nations of our position. I found it beneficial to express our regrets to Mr Gobbi before informing the United Nations.

In reply to a question, Denktas said that the events in the south will concern only the south until the establishment of a joint federal republic.

KIPRIANOU INAUGURATES SATELLITE EARTH STATION

NC121842 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Excerpt] This afternoon, President Kiprianou inaugurated the Makarios satellite earth station at Kakoratzia [near the 23d milestone on the Nicosia-Limassol highway].

In his speech, Kiprianou expressed particular pleasure at having the opportunity to inaugurate and officially open the station and congratulated the Cyprus Telecommunications Authority [CYTA] for its continuous efforts to improve telecommunications. He said: Our outstanding people have proved that, even under adverse conditions, they are struggling for progress.

Kiprianou stressed that it was in the interest of all people and the state in general for the struggle to continue, no matter how difficult it might be, because nobody knew how long it might take for a lasting and just solution of the Cypriot problem. The president of the republic reiterated: We are not prepared to sacrifice substance for an early solution of the problem, endorse the faits accomplis or sell out our people's rights. He said: We are passing through difficult times; therefore, let us not add the division of our people to this. Mr Kiprianou stressed that at such critical moments, the people's concord constituted the most primary prerequisite for the success of the struggle against unacceptable solutions.

The president of the republic concluded: I call on all people to continue the struggle united and confident that we shall save our country and hand over to the coming generations a free Cyprus in which all its inhabitants will live united without Green Lines and Attilas.

GREEK LANGUAGE DAILIES COMMENT ON COUP IN TURKEY

NC130756 [Editorial Report] Nicosia Greek language dailies of 13 September give front-page coverage to the coup in Turkey. The communist KHARAVYI and the pro-Lissaridhis paper TA NEA condemn the coup and state that it is the work of the Americans.

To substantiate its claim that "the coup has been carried out with American inspiration" KHARAVYI refers to a report carried by HURRIYET "only 12 hours prior to the midnight developments" stating that "NATO circles in Brussels have expressed discontent for the situation in Turkey, particularly because of the opposition policy to prevent a resolution of Greek-Turkish differences as well as Greece's return to the military wing of NATO." It concludes: "As of yesterday, life in Turkey for the unfortunate Turkish people has become worse than Hell. However, the people will never cease fighting until they are freed from the chains of international imperialism and fascism."

TA NEA says that a "military coup took place in Turkey at dawn yesterday with the blessing of the United States and NATO," adding that this is the view among authoritative observers in European capitals. In the comment the paper says that "imperialism and Zionism, which have employed the Turkish Armed Forces to drown the Cyprus republic in blood and to exterminate 1.5 percent of the Cypriot people, are now using the same forces against the Turkish people in order to consolidate imperialist interests and the American and NATOite presence in Turkey as well as to increase the threat from this American-NATOite presence against the countries neighboring Turkey." The paper adds that the coup "causes uncertainty about the course of Greek-Turkish relations; it puts at stake Greek-Turkish and inter-Cypriot talks scheduled for 16 September" and adds that it constitutes a threat to peace. The paper urges the government to carefully consider future prospects both in connection with the intercommunal talks and the course of the Cyprus problem--"particularly with regard to defense because none can rule out the possibility that Ankara will not seek fresh Attila laurels - as well as with regard to the internal front. This is so because the designs of those who have set loose the coupist forces and who have not hesitated to express relief for the success of the Ankara junta are unknown."

The ELEVTHERI KIPROS, I SIMERINI, FILELEVTHEROS and I MAKHI are more cautious with their reportage and their content.

The progovernment ELEVTHERI KIPROS wonders how one could describe the Cyprus problem today following the military coup in Turkey, because until now we used to say that it is in a delicate or critical phase. It says that "events in Turkey have found us in a state of political decomposition; the absence of unity among the people is most obvious; the differences among the political parties is provocatively chaotic; the relations of the parties with the government are almost hostile." The paper appeals to the president of the republic "to immediately convene the national council in order to responsibly deal with the new situation. It is the imperative duty of all the political leaders to reciprocate to the invitation. They must set aside their differences, they must jointly ponder over this serious problem, and guided by the supreme national interests they must seek ways and means to face the dangers that threaten us."

I SIMERINI, the pro-Kliridhis opposition paper, says that the military coup in Turkey will have indirect and probably direct repercussions on the Cyprus problem. The paper adds that according to its assessment, when Ankara has to face an increasing number of problems, the effort for a Cyprus solution becomes more difficult and adds that there will be "unpredictable side effects" from the coup, and thus the situation becomes more confused and confirms the view that time works against Cyprus and its problem, particularly in view of the absence of a responsible and strong government. It stresses: "At last, something must now be done. Athens must now understand that the silly doctrine 'Cyprus makes the decisions....' is totally inapplicable and quite dangerous for the future of both Cyprus and Greece. There must be some practical and protective interest on the part of Athens because, unfortunately, the talks will not bear fruit. The [Greek] nation must include Cyprus within its foreign policy. It has a moral, legal and primarily national obligation to see how the Turkish troops, which constitute a direct threat to all of Cyprus, will leave our country." The paper concludes: "When the new state of affairs settles down in Turkey, it will be the duty of Athens to see, within the framework of the general problems confronting Greek-Turkish relations, what can be done."

The independent paper O FILELEVTHEROS, expressing concern about developments in Turkey, says that it is not possible to predict what will happen, yet events in Turkey will affect Cyprus.

It says: "We are on the eve of the intercommunal dialogue. How is the dialogue going to develop: In what direction is Denktas going to act in view of the fact that first reports from the Turkish quarter of Nicosia say that his supporters are celebrating because of the military coup in Turkey." The paper refers to the need for vigilance over developments in Turkey and adds that nobody knows what will happen from one moment to another, even though the danger of Turkish military provocations at this moment might appear remote. It concludes: "Greece and Cyprus must vigilantly watch developments in Turkey because if their results--whatever they might be--are not manifested now, they will be manifested in the future without fail."

The independent paper O AGON, quoting authoritative political circles as well as western diplomats in Nicosia, says that "the military coup in Turkey might prove a conducive factor for favorable developments concerning Greek-Turkish problems and the Cyprus problem. "According to the assessment of authoritative circles the coup is aimed at combating leftism and Islam, which have brought anarchy to the country. In connection with foreign relations, the same circles say that "the United States believes that the only way to settle the problems in Greek-Turkish relations and the Cyprus problem is to have a strong power controlling the affairs of state that could shoulder the pertinent heavy responsibilities. The Turkish military seems to be oriented in the direction of settling these differences, and it is worth noting these intentions because it is a fact that NOTAM 714 was lifted by Turkey at the initiative and the orders of the coup leader, General Evren. The same circles have said that they do not believe that the military coup in Turkey will lead to the adjournment of the intercommunal talks, which are scheduled for next Tuesday. They have also said that it is premature to preduct the repercussions from the coup on the Turkish Cypriots' domestic affairs. On the other hand, a western diplomat has said that one should not rule out favorable repercussions on Greek-Turkish affairs and the Cyprus problem as a result of the army takeover because, as he said, the fear of the Turkish Governments in the past to undertake responsibility was preventing a settlement of these problems, the solution of which is now in the hands of the Turkish Army." In its comment the paper says that there is a divergence of assessment concerning developments in Turkey and adds: "We, as Greeks, must closely watch developments in Turkey and must be ready to face any eventuality."

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON KIPRIANOU GOVERNMENT RESHUFFLE

NC120807 [Editorial Report] Reaction to the 10 September reshuffle of Cypriot President Kiprianou's cabinet has been highlighted by the Nicosia Greek and English language press for the past 3 days. One critic of Kiprianou's government reshuffle is the socialist EDEK Party Central Secretariat which, in a statement carried on page 1 of the pro-Lissaridhis paper TA NEA on 11 September, says that Cyprus needs a strong political government that will be able to proceed with radical changes in order to furnish radical solutions and to effectively defend the people's rights. The statement points out that the government is not in a position to meet its responsibilities, and accuses the president of the republic of gradually changing his policy because of pressure from the Democratic Rally and AKEL, this being proved by reports on the preparation of a draft constitution in accordance with the demands of the AKEL leadership. The statement also calls the peple to vigilance in order "to prevent any fresh concessions that would jeopardize the exixtence of Cypriot Hellenism."

In a statement carried by I SIMERINI on page 1 on 11 September, Kiridhis' Democratic Rally also criticizes the cabinet reshuffle saying that "this is a mere change in persons" and stressing that "the composition of the new government does not augur a change in policy, while it fails to furnish any guarantee that fresh absurd mistakes--similar to the ones committed during the last 30 months--will be avoided." The statement add that the Democratic Rally believes in the need for a strong political government which will be able to work out and implement a serious political line. In conclusion the statement reiterates the Democratic Rally demand for the resignation of the president of the republic.

Another strong critic of President Kiprianou is his outgoing education minister, Dr Khrisostomos Sofianos, who issued a statement on 10 September, which was carried on page 1 of the 11 September Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English, accusing the president of abandoning the Makarios line. In his statement he also defends his education policy and says that he wants "to caution the people that immense dangers appear because of the inadequacy of the leadership in which the people had originally invested great hopes, but which in the end led to disappointment and humiliation."

In a page 1 article in TA NEA on 12 September an EDEK spokesman, answering President Kiprianou's response to criticism, reiterates the charges about concessions by the president and adds that there is a chasm between Kiprianou's words and deeds. The EDEK spokesman also accuses the president of having accepted Waldheim's detrimental procedures, of having accepted the term bizonality, and of having adopted the policy for a Cyprus solution by stages.

All the Nicosia Greek language dailies--with the exception of the progovernment ELEVTHERI KIPROS and the independent FILELEVTHEROS--also offer comment on the cabinet reshuffle.

An editorial carried by AKEL's mouthpiece, KHARAVYI, on 12 September reiterates the various AKEL charges against the Kiprianou government and stresses: "The hasty, pointless and unsuccessful reshuffle is nothing but a demonstration of the president's political isolation, a demonstration of the complete failure of his policy. Kiprianou has failed because he has never kept his promises, because he has never shown consistency with or insistence on the collective line that was charted during the hard years of the struggle under Makarios' leadership." The editorial also quotes from the AKEL Politburo statement on 10 September by which AKEL withdraws support for the government.

In a front-page editorial on 11 September, the pro-Kliridhis daily I SIMERINI says that although it would be reasonable to allow the new government time to implement its program, this cannot be done now because there is no prospect that the government will be successful. The editorial observes that as individuals the new ministers might be inspired by good intentions, but as a government they are not what the country needs today. It stresses: "The problem has been clearly defined: It is the president's mentality." The editorial concludes: "The holding of parliamentary and presidential elections must be stepped up. From now on any delay would create fresh dangers for the future of the country. If the country is to hope for the future it must be governed by a strong political and responsible leadership. Such a leadership for both the parliament and the government can only come from the people."

In a front-page editorial on 11 September, the extreme rightwing daily I MAKHI says "the notorious government reshuffle was finally carried out very late in the night" and adds that "the method and timing of the announcement of the reshuffle is unprecedented." The paper says that in order to be fair and objective, the only thing which we rejoice over is Mr Sofianos' removal from the Ministry of Education." The editorial launches a strong attack on the outgoing education minister, accusing him of having destroyed education in Cyprus. It adds that the new government did not unify the people and this is seen in the reaction from the various quarters. It concludes: "At this moment we confine ourselves to saying that the new government does not unite the people; it does not inspire confidence in the people; it cannot furnish radical and definite solutions to the people's problems. We shall be happy if we are proved wrong."

On 11 September the independent paper O AGON carried an editorial by "the observer" bitterly criticizing the government reshuffle and saying that the new government formed by President Kiprianou is weak, cannot meet the people's demands during the current crucial times and will further divide the people. The observer notes that the president has again failed to achieve his goals and that all these failures are not only detrimental to him but they are also harmful to the people and the country and adds that the president should have formed a national salvation government. In conclusion, the observer says that the president's action leads our domestic affairs from a bad situation to a worse situation and adds: "We continue to fail to see any outlet other than the immediate recourse to the people. And we call upon the president to consider this course while there is still time."

ELEVTHEROTIPIA CRITICIZES 'PROTECTORS' OF TURKISH MILITARY COUP

AT141438 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 14 Sep 80 p 1, 22

[From the "Opinions" column: "Congratulations 'Protectors'!"]

[Text] Washington, Bonn, NATO and the other warm supporters of Ankara's militarists can now rejoice at their "Turkish democracy."

Let them rejoice and pay dearly for it, both in the former cryptofascist regime of Demirel-Ecevit and company and in the current undisguisedly fascist regime of the soldiers of "prudent" General Evren.

Let them rejoice at it as they rejoiced at the other "exemplary" regime of the deceased shah of Iran and as they currently rejoice at the "publicly elected" (since plebiscites were also held) regimes of Pinochet, As-Sadat, Husayn, Hassan and the entire international fascist gang.

The flatterers of the Pentagon and NATO hastened to express their relief at everything that happened the day before yesterday in Turkey on the basis of a well-known formula. Of course they did not fail to forecast that the operation of democratic institutions will soon be restored and to affirm that military and economic aid will not cease flowing to our starving neighbor.

Thus they solved a problem once again. If the tooth aches, cut off the head. As soon as things become difficult they can impose dictatorship and the "free world" is saved.

This proves once again the shortsightedness of the policy of the hawks of Washington and Brussels who do not understand that they can no longer rely upon juntas and fascists.

At this moment Greece has the privilege of being the last eastern democratic bulwark of the West. And our "allies" can be sure--since "we belong to the West"--that very soon they will be imploring us to save the soft underbelly of the eastern Mediterranean when they have lost the last card they are now playing in Ankara.

Tanks never provide solutions. Juntas never create credible governments. The world marches ahead. Democracy, thickheaded gentlemen of Washington, Bonn and Brussels, is the only guarantee for every positive development.

Resign yourselves to this at last, so that people are not slaughtered and you do not spend your money to no avail....

GENERAL EVREN MAKES STATEMENT AT PRESS CONFERENCE

TA161230 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Statement by Gen Kenan Evren, head of state, chief of staff and National Security Council president, at a news conference at the Prime Ministry on 16 September--recorded]

[Text] The distinguished representatives of the Turkish and world press: I greet you all with my best wishes.

Every person with common sense living in a democracy realizes the extent of the services offered by the West to the Turkish free and democratic systems and the contributions of the distinguished members of the West to the survival of democracy. I am proud of addressing you with this belief.

Dear members of the press: The democratic system is a system of virtues. Democracy survives through the existence of virtuous individuals. All the freedoms granted by democracy are intended for those who believe in it. If those who wish to destroy the democratic system and replace it with another system try to attain their goals especially by using the rights and freedoms granted by democracy, then how will the rights and freedoms of millions of virtuous people who have believed in democracy be protected? This, in my opinion, is the essence of the matter. This is the first issue that is not understood--consciously or unconsciously.

How can all the organizations, which form the body of democracy, grant democratic rights and freedoms to those who wish to destroy democracy just because democracy exists and allow them to benefit from the laws that apply to virtuous citizens? When the situation is as it is, how can laws be passed against terrorism and anarchy? This is why the system was not--consciously or unconsciously--equipped with the laws to protect itself. While these laws were being discussed in the assemblies, the virtuous citizen was not considered. Only the democratic rights of those who wish to destroy the system were considered.

The democratic system has existed in Turkey for over 30 years. The basic structure of the state was founded on the belief that sovereignty belongs to the nation unconditionally. The judicial authority is exercised by free and independent judicial organs on behalf of the nation, the legislative authority by the Turkish Grand National Assembly and its representatives, who are elected by the nation on its behalf, and the executive authority by the government that is elected from within the Grand National Assembly. This is Turkey's basic structure. All these are stipulated by our constitution and, above all, as stated in the foreward of the constitution, Turkish democracy has been based on the Ataturk reforms. This is the second matter that is--consciously or unconsciously--not understood.

From the beginning all the constitutional organizations which were established to protect democracy were blind, through permissiveness and tolerance, and did not oppose and even encouraged--through silence or with the lightest of terms--all the statements made in an attempt to divert our democracy from the Ataturk reforms by acting as if the basis of Ataturk's reforms did not exist. They were blind to the covert and overt actions to this end.

Every system needs sound (?ideological) protectors. This is the main way of defending the system without guns. Unfortunately, the Turkish democratic system, which has been based on Ataturk's reforms, has been threatened by the Ataturkist ideology and has--consciously or unconsciously--been rendered incapable of raising new generations. This is the third important matter.

In our schools--from the primary schools to the universities--instead of carrying out a Kemalist education based on Ataturk's principles, on the contrary, leftist, rightist or reactionary ideas were disseminated. Those propagating these ideas were none other than teachers and professors receiving their salaries from the state.

As a result, our honest children--our most valuable asset--have been divided into hostile camps. The voice of numerous Kemalist and patriotic teachers and professors was muffled. A year ago, a number of teachers came to us with the complaint that they were afraid to proclaim themselves to be Kemalists in their schools because they were in a minority. In Ankara, the capital, and under the very eyes of the state, the issue of terrorist sources was openly discussed during the congress of a teachers' association without any interference by the authorities. How could the young generations entrusted with safeguarding democracy be trained in such an atmosphere? That is why we claim that the young generation capable of safeguarding the republic has not been trained properly and we are convinced that all 45 million Turkish citizens agree with this view. The Turkish Armed Forces are also part of the Turkish nation and are among its most loyal element.

The right of forming associations--which is free in all democratic systems--has been misused. Thousands of associations have been transformed into political organizations, which passed judgment on the country's regime--alienating themselves from the goals for which they were formed--and engaged in an overt and covert struggle aimed at destroying the democratic system. The laborious, honest and patriotic Turkish workers--who have no other worry than to insure their future and make a living by working hard day and night for the prosperity of the country--have been given red flags by certain masters which are to be carried with pictures of foreigners. They were used in a treacherous way in a bid to destroy the democratic system and replace it with another. Thus our patriotic workers alos were divided into several groups and a plot was put into operation stage by stage. As if all this was not bad enough, a final attempt was made to propagate this divisiveness among the sects and races--whose members had lived in peace for centuries.

It is because of the reasons that I have tried to explain until now that the Turkish democratic system has been derailed in Turkey and plunged into a crisis. Despite all these and other factors and stands, some of the constitutional organs as well as the political parties have not been awakened from their neglect and have been rather involved in personal, group or partisan arguments without caring for what was happening or saying or doing what was necessary. If any one of one group came out with a statement on the situation, those in the other camp accused him of lust for power, thus proving that they were unable to realize that by letting the ship sink they would also suffer the same consequences.

Our dear nation has watched all that was happening without being able to interfere and has been frustrated becaus no solution was in sight. The Turkish Armed Forces have always been the defenders of the state. This is a task entrusted to us by Ataturk. It is also the wish of our dear people. Our people have always considered the Turkish Armed Forces as their protectors and have lived under the security provided by its members. Because of the lack of attempts to solve the crisis of the democratic system and the continued existence of this problem, 8 months ago the Turkish Armed Forces expressed their worries and demands in a letter of warning submitted to the proper authorities in a manner befitting the democratic system. They continued to make attempts to this end within the framework of the democratic system. Concern has been expressed in the National Security Council's monthly meetings and all necessary warnings have been made. Unfortunately, weeks turned into months and neither was a measure that would solve the problem taken nor was unity and solidarity provided on this great national issue. Because their warnings were not heeded, the Turkish Armed Forces have, as a last resort, fulfilled their legal tasks, the wish of the people and the orders of Ataturk.

This is an operation to protect and defend the republic. This operation is in line with the wishes of the entire armed forces and our dear nation. I would especially like to point out that this is not the kind of coup mentioned in history books. It has been launched in accordance with the wishes of the army and the nation. If this intervention had not been effected, within a few years secret and treacherous forces would have penetrated the armed forces as well and begun dividing them. Destructive and secessionist forces were not able to acquire respect or supporters from our great nation. The cries of the orphans left behind through the murders of our watchmen, policemen and soldiers--a part of our people--and the suffering of parents have shown that these forces are not at the side of the people. They claim to be fighting for the people.

Meanwhile, the incidents in Konya [NSP Rally] indicated the extent of the dimensions of reactionaryism. Our nation was awakened by these incidents and realized all aspects of the danger. Carefully studying the statement by a party leader during a congress will demonstrate the nature of his opinion. This party leader saw university students becoming anarchists due to their sitting at their desks and was able to say: If these children had studied by kneeling in front of their teachers--as is the case in certain schools and universities--they would not have grown into anarchists. Even 100 years ago we did not have such an education system. So far there have been numerous statements along the same line. However, all the applications by the public prosecutors failed to secure the annullment of the relevant persons' immunity. So, what will happen? If a parliamentarian is reelected in every election, will it never be possible to try him in court in spite of the fact that he has committed a crime. Is it possible that in a democratic country anarchy, secessionism, terrorism, intimidation, extortion and the oppression of the citizens have reached such dimensions? How much longer can the system endure this situation? Would our nation not inquire whether there is a state? If everyone attempts to defend his own rights, they what would be the fate of such a state?

It is possible to continue with these questions. The rapid and bloodless conclusion of the operation is a sign of our great nation's wish and the clearest expression of our nation's hatred for destructive, seccessionist and reactionary circles. At the moment, the life of the citizens are back to normal and all efforts will be exerted to further improve it.

I could summarize the goals of this operation in the following manner: 1) To maintain the national unity; 2) to restore the security of life and property and by preventing anarchy and terrorism; 3) to insure the primacy of state authority and to protect it; 4) to secure social peace and insure national understanding and solidarity; 5) to render operational the secular republic system based on social justice, individual rights and freedoms and human rights; 6) finally, after concluding the legal arrangements, to reinstate the civil administration within a reasonable time. As always, the light which will direct us in attaining our goals will consist of Ataturkism and its principles.

The National Security Council is determined to eliminate all the obstacles, which have so far prevented the sound functioning of the democratic order and system, in such a manner that another such intervention will not be necessary: Therefore, the articles in the existing laws such as the laws on election and political parties, which resulted in the current situation, will either be amended or new articles will be added. In addition, the necessary laws will be prepared to strengthen the judicial organs, which will effectively avert anarchy and terrorism and the shortcomings of penal code will be amended. Anarchy will not be allowed to flourish under the guise of freedom or independence in schools, universities or labor unions. An authorized, responsible, viable and adequate democratic, social and legal order which respects the right of the citizen will be realized. This order will be achieved in stages in a short time.

As you are well aware, there is a Security Council which has legislative authority. A council composed of under secretaries having the authorities of ministers is performing the duties of an executive organ under my leadership. A Council of Ministers will be formed within the week. A provisional constitution will be prepared and subsequently a constituent assembly will be formed. Dear press officials, it is a known fact that the Turkish economy is facing great problems, that inflation is increasing and that there is a decrease in production and instability in production because our industry is not functioning at full capacity. The stability program aimed at saving our country from the current economic crisis, at alleviating the problems of our people, at security economic development and thus providing new work for the increasing labor force will be implemented. Social goals will be achieved as soon as possible by facilitating the functioning of the economy in accordance with natural laws. The support of OECD member countries and of international financial and economic organizations will be secured for the economic stability program being implemented in Turkey.

The necessary legal arrangements aimed at eliminating the economic crisis in the country will be dealt with as soon as possible. The patience, strength and sacrifice of our people as individuals as well as in unity will be our primary guarantee in implementing all the economic measures to be taken aimed at solving all our problems.

Dear press officials, we will insure that all teachers, civil servants and other officials, employers and employees continue to perform their duties as responsible individuals with a sense of duty, with patriotism, national unity, and brotherhood while mutually respecting one another's rights. The principles of justice and impartiality are important for officials in the state service. All plots and establishments that are incompatible with these principles will not be tolerated. The necessary legal action will be taken in such cases. The employer-employee relations, which have reached a breaking point due to ideological reasons, will be readjusted in a way which will secure the rights of workers and which will respect and understand the rights of employers. I believe that labor peace will secure the social and economic rights of the workers, will increase productivity and will be in the interests of the whole Turkish nation.

As in all fields in the field of foreign policy as well, the new regime will adopt a peaceful stand in accordance with the aspirations of the Turkish people and Ataturks's motto of peace in the country and peace in the world. In all its relations with other countries, Turkey will act within the principles of independence, sovereignty, respect for integrity of territories and noninterference in the internal affairs of others and equality of rights as stipulated in the UN Charter. As it acts in accordance with these principles, Turkey will carefully expect other countries to comply with them. All aggression and threats directed against Turkey, Turkey's territorial and national unity or Turkish citizens will be countered.

Turkey will continue to pursue its traditional policy of contributing as much as possible to regional and world peace. Turkey will support the process of detente, which it considers a necessity in the present circumstances. All of Turkey's existing agreements in the fields of security, economy and politics will continue to be effective. Turkey will continue to fulfill its commitments in these agreements on the basis of reciprocity. Our relations within the NATO treaty will continue. We believe that this organization continues to be important for safeguarding global peace and security.

Our relations as well as cooperation with the EEC, the Council of Europe, as well as all other organizations in which countries which cherish democracy are members, will continue. In line with these multilateral relations, efforts to develop bilateral relations with the United States, the nine European countries and other Western countries will continue.

Attention will be paid to the development and strengthening of relations with the Islamic countries--with which we have historic and traditional ties--in all fields in an atmosphere of friendship and understanding. To maintain good relations and a fruitful cooperation with all our neighboring countries is our sincerest wish.

The Soviet Union--which carries a great responsibility in the prevalence and strengthening of global peace and security--occupies a special place among our neighbors.

All the problems with Greece will be solved in a just manner through goodwilled and constructive bilateral negotiations.

With regard to the Cyprus issue, we hope for the solution of this problem within the framework of agreements reached between the leaders of the two communities and through intercommunal talks.

Dear citizens, the Turkish Armed Forces, which has always considered the lofty interests of the country and the people above all else, after having completed this historic duty, will fully return to its principal duty of defending the country with a sense of duty and dignity.

The Turkish Armed Forces has by no means lost any of its power and force by having undertaken such a duty. It is performing its duty effectively. From the first moment of the operation, the great understanding shown by all our citizens in abiding by the orders and communiques of the National Security Council and their cool-headed manner have proved how right we were in trusting our people. Therefore, I consider it my duty and pleasure to once more express, on my behalf and on behalf of the Turkish Armed Forces, my gratitude for the patriotism and understanding shown by the lofty Turkish nation at these difficult moments. I thank you all.

VOTCP REPORTS MASS ARRESTS, CRITICIZES MILITARY

Activities in Kurdistan, Elsewhere

TA151205 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Text] The pro-American and pro-NATO junta has begun mass arrests throughout the country. It is reported that villages in Turkish Kurdistan have been blockaded and that houses are being searched one by one.

The junta headed by General Evren has increased throughout the country the mass arrests and detentions which it initiated on the first day of the military coup. Over 100 parliamentarians were arrested after the parliament was dissolved. These parliamentarians have been placed in various prisons in the country.

Western news agencies also confirm that RPP leftwing, NSP and independent Kurdish parliamentarians constitute the majority of those arrested. It is also reported that antifascist patriotic parliamentarians, the administrators of the Turkish Labor Party and the Turkish Socialist Workers Party--who were arrested by the junta on the first day of the coup--the leaders of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions and its affiliated unions and of democratic organizations and associations are being detained under very difficult conditions. Concern is also being expressed for their lives.

Meanwhile, based on reports by various news agencies, West German radio stations report that mass arrests are being carried out in Turkish Kurdistan. Regions mostly populated by our Kurdish citizens--cities, districts and villages--have been besieged by special armoured commando units. The house of every progressive Kurdish democrat is being searched in blockaded villages. Citizens are being arrested en masse. It is reported that the life of every Kurdish citizen known as a democrat and a progressive is in great danger.

The military junta will have to give an account for this oppression of our people and the Kurdish people. The pro-American junta should be aware of this.

Arrests of Unionists

[Summary] The military junta that seized power in Turkey has forced 70,000 workers who were on strike as well as more than 200,000 workers in private and public enterprises that were about to strike to resume work by promising a raise of 70 percent and tried thus to deceive them. Moreover, the Evren junta began arresting the union representatives at work sites. "The arrest of the union representatives in work places has provoked a deep anger among the working class."

However, workers and toilers shall not bow to the pressures by the junta, which is the tool of monopolies. They shall find ways of resisting and insuring their rights in accordance with the new conditions. The junta's hands which interfered with the workers' livelihood and liberties, shall be broken. "Down with the junta, the enemy of workers and toilers."

The junta is arresting the trade union representatives at work sites in a bid to fulfill the requests of employers that will condemn the workers to hunger. "The arrest of thousands of unionists has provoked a great reaction among the workers. They are slowing down and decreasing production in all factories. Workers say: No force can deter us from our struggle for livelihood and liberties. The generals of the junta are forcing us with bayonets to yield to the conditions of hunger by the monopolist employers. We shall not bow to these pressures."

Criticism of Military

[Text] The pro-American military junta that seized power in Turkey is continuing its mass arrests in regions defined as "sensitive areas." Extensive operations are being carried out by the junta mainly in Istanbul, Ankara, Izmir, Adana and areas of Eastern Anatolia in which the Kurdish people live in large concentrations. Thousands of workers, toilers, progressive and democratic elements have been detained.

In operations carried out in Gultepe, Cumhuriyet, Cigli, Inciralti and Karlidere-the slum areas of Izmir in which workers live--more than 2,000 people have been arrested. In Adana more than 500 persons have been detained by the martial law command. It has been learned that thousands of people were detained in operations carried out in the Kecioren, Etlik, Bahcelievler, Abidinpasa, Hurmuzderesi and (Seyhan) Baglari Quarters of Ankara.

The offices of trade unions affiliated with the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] as well as progressive associations in Istanbul and Ankara were raided by security forces and searches were conducted. The residences of some trade union and democratic association officials were raided and many arrests were carried out.

In Balikesir, Kirklareli and Canakkale, the offices of progressive organizations like DISK and the Turkish Teachers' Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER] were searched and a great number of progressive and revolutionary persons and students were detained. Sixteen mayors--eight belonging to the RPP--were removed from their office and were mostly replaced by army officers. The Ankara, Istanbul, Izmir and Diyarbakir mayors are among these.

As it will be recalled, more than 100 members of parliament were arrested by the pro-American military junta beginning 12 September. Deputies belonging to the RPP's left wing, the NSP and the independent Kurdish members of parliament constitute the bulk of those arrested. Concern is being expressed for the lives of officials of the Turkish Labor Party, Turkish Socialist Workers Party, DISK and trade unions affiliated with it and democratic association officials who were arrested by the junta on the first day of the tour.

The Kurdish nation in Turkish Kurdistan is being subject to intensive pressures. Houses are being searched thoroughly and extensive arrests are being carried out.

The Turkish working class, our toiling people and democratic forces shall recover from this and ask for an account of this tyranny without being carried out and with cool heads. Our people shall not bow to the tyranny of the cruel junta.

TERCUMAN COMMENTS ON EVREN'S FOREIGN POLICY

NC150935 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 14 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Fahir Armaoglu: "National Security Council and Foreign Policy"]

[Text] The address made by chief of general staff and president of the National Security Council honorable Gen Evren to the Turkish Nation the other day was undoubtedly watched with interest by Turkey's allies, friends and neighbors. What honorable Evren had to say about foreign policy has brought relief to those who were worried that there might be a change in our foreign policy, and disillusioned those who expected such a change. In other words, our friends and allies who were worried that anarchy and subversive activities in Turkey might weaken and shake our country severely, are now pleased with the new developments. On the other hand, those who hoped that our country would be dragged into a civil war have been utterly disappointed.

The fact that there will be no change in foreign policy will enable Turkey to gain extremely positive results, particularly in its relations with the West. Although in 1980 Turkey managed to activate Western sources into saving the economy and although our Western friends and allies have extended a helping hand, we must admit that this was done with some hesitation both in granting new credits and in agreeing to defer debts. This was because the ever-increasing anarchy and terror made these states concerned over Turkey's future and the granting of economic aid while anarchy and terror persisted in our country. As the National Security Council administration has begun to eliminate the dangers of internal strife, the fear and anxiety in the minds of our friends and allies is subsiding. This will give Turkey more scope in establishing its economic relations.

Nevertheless, we want to emphasize two more points: Some countries will be disturbed when Turkey achieves peace and tranquility at home, solidifies its national integrity and unity, and secures a healthier political and democratic structure. This may cause dangers of a different nature for Turkey.

On the other hand, there will be certain suggestions or even pressure on the part of our Western friends and allies to settle the Cyprus and Aegean disputes. Naturally, an early solution of these matters is in the interest of Turkey. Anxiety over internal policy made former governments lose maneuverability. Now Turkey no longer has this burden. But our Western friends must not attempt to take undue advantage of this situation, because Turkey is motivated by serious national interests.

CUMHURIYET DISCUSSES CYPRUS ISSUE, NATO

NC160805 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 15 Sep 80 p 3

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "What Does the West Expect"]

[Excerpts] Western reports reaching our country soon after the military takeover in Turkey indicate that these circles have received the latest developments in Turkey with cautious optimism. What lies behind this optimism? What are the expectations of the West from our foreign policy? Foremost, the West does not want Turkey to break away from NATO and to renounce its present treaties and obligations. In his 12 September speech, State Security Council President and Head of State Gen Kenan Evren clearly stated that this is out of the question.

The two issues of Turkish foreign policy, which have been of most interest to the West in recent years are interrelated. One is the Cyprus dispute and the other is Greece's re-integration into NATO's military flank for which Turkey's consent is a prerequisite.

Cyprus is the second issue. Steps toward resolving this dispute have been taken. The resumption of the bilateral talks had already been determined earlier. These talks are going to be held on the date fixed and the West expects concrete results from the bilateral talks in Cyprus.

GUNAYDIN COMMENTARIES DISCUSS MILITARY COUP

NC151030 [Editorial Report] Under the heading "Everybody Must Consent to the Arbitration of the Armed Forces," Husamettin Celebi in Istanbul's GUNAYDIN in Turkish on 13 September writes: "The truth is that the political cadres have failed to show the sagacity expected of them and that the commanders have had to take over the administration when all their well-meaning warnings had gone unheeded." Celebi continues: "It is now the duty of the authorities to determine the extent to which politicians have contributed to the present situation. History will have a lot to say. But, undoubtedly, the most important role which history will establish is the fact that the commanders exercised great patience up to this point. History will even record that the commanders, as the nation believes, were too patient for words."

Addressing himself to the anarchists both on the right and the left, Husameetin Celebi comments: "This is an opportunity for them to abandon the adventures they engaged in during the recent nightmarish period. The goals announced by the new administration indicate that such insanity will never again be allowed to happen. They would be wise to come to their senses and prepared to atone for their acts. It would be in their best interests if they not resort to new intrigues."

GUNAYDIN also carries a commentary by Teoman Erel in his column "The situation in Ankara." Among other things, Erel writes: "The truth of the matter is that the regime was in a state of suffocation when the intervention occurred. How many things can be said of Suleyman Demirel, who infuriated most of us with his 11 September television speech. But what is the use? If a prime minister is toppled twice by the armed forces, he must be sufferingthe severest punishment before history." The writer further says: "May God help the new administration. Turkey is in very serious condition. The issues are so complicated that even Alexander the Great's sword cannot resolve them. During this transition period Turkey is such a typical patient that if you touch its belly, its ear will ache and if you squeeze its nose, it will be constipated. Even it it pursues the kind of economic and political policies approved by the West, some Western governments may say 'if you do not return to democracy rapidly, we will not give you credits'." The writer concludes: "Let us underline certain points so that we may not be taken as having expressed pessimism right from the start: Complying with its traditions, the Turkish Armed Forces has preserved its chain of command and carried out the intervention without bloodshed. Moreover, they have stated right on the first day that there will be a return to democracy. We pray that they will emerge from this difficult undertaking completely unblemished, and they will restablish democracy as early as possible.

OPEC CONFERENCE CONCLUDES WITHOUT AGREEMENT ON PRICE SYSTEM

Proceedings of Second Day

AU160745 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 16 Sep 80

Saudi Minister Interviewed

AU161125 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 16 Sep 80 p 6

[Excerpt] The relationship between OPEC and developing countries as well as between OPEC and the industrial countries has been discussed. Questioned by journalists, Saudi Petroleum Minister Yamani stated that his country has not yet made a decision on the quantity of its oil output in the last quarter of this year. The Middle East economy survey branch information service, published in Nicosia, reported that Saudi Arabia would have been ready to reduce its present output of 9.5 million barrels daily by one million barrels effective 1 October, but a rudely worded letter from the Iranian oil minister, which arrived recently in Riyadh, has annoyed the Saudi Arabian Government so much that it is once more reconsidering its decision. Yamani also stated that he hoped that it would be possible at the current conference to achieve a uniform price structure. But he had no specific proposals about a solution concerning quality surcharges. Currently surcharges up to $5 per barrel above the fixed OPEC price are being collected. Petroleum Minister Al-'Utaybah of the United Arab Emirates stated earlier that in his view quality surcharges must be limited to $2 per barrel.

Special Committees Formed

AU161118 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1000 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Text] The thus far conflicting views about the future oil price structure and development aid have prompted the foreign, finance and energy ministers of the 13 OPEC states at their deliberations to set up two special committees to seek possibilities for agreement. Saudi Arabia's proposal for shaping oil prices depending on inflation rates, economic growth and rate of exchange fluctuations in the Western industrial states has met with opposition. First and foremost Iran upholds the view that such a linkage is useless without a previous agreement on output quantities. Iranian delegation head (Sebakhban) this morning expressed the view that a breakdown of the negotiations on production quantities could lead to an adjournment of the summit meeting of the heads of state and government of the 13 OPEC countries envisaged for this November in Baghdad.

Press Conference Held

[Excerpts] At a press conference after the conclusion of the morning round of talks, OPEC press spokesman Hamid Zaheri stated that the two commissions have begun their work. The reservations about a long-term strategy raised by Iran, Libya and Algeria have not yet been eliminated, but there was still hope of reaching an agreement in Vienna.

In the commission dealing with problems of development aid, the OPEC finance ministers worked out a plan to enlarge the already existing special fund that has been assigned $4 billion and to transform it into a bank or bank-like institution whose funds would total $20 billion. This institution would grant interest-free loans to the poorer developing countries. On the question of whether prices and production cuts also were discussed at the morning session, Zaheri stated it was impossible to discuss prices without a connection with the output level. Zaheri avoided any details, however. In addition the press spokesman complained about media reports of sharp differences among OPEC members. Different views did exist, but the OPEC member states harbor "full and mutual understanding for each other." With respect to the envisaged OPEC summit meeting in Baghdad, Zaheri stated that the date could coincide with the date on the U.S. presidential elections--this would be about 5 November.

The Venezuelan oil minister, Calderon, suggested a possible compromise to journalists. He said that a 5-percent reduction in overall OPEC production, which currently totals 27 million barrels daily, would be possible but Calderon did not disclose how the reduced quantities should be distributed, and particularly whether Saudi Arabia would actually reduce its output from 9.5 to 8.5 million barrels daily.

Tuesday morning Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faysal, who met with Federal President Dr Rudolf Kirchschlaeger and Federal Chancellor Dr Kreisky, once more clarified the Saudi attitude: approval of a long-term strategy is necessary before an agreement on production cuts. Prince al-Faysal added that several states are demanding excessive prices for oil. In his opinion, the current OPEC price of $32 per barrel is too high. In addition, the right price is less an issue of negotiations but rather one of the market.

Iraqi, UAE Ministers Depart

AU170959 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1950 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Some delegation members had already left Vienna this noon, including most importantly the Iraqi foreign minister and the foreign minister of the United Arab Emirates. Tonight some 220 of the original 250 delegation participants were still present here in Vienna's Hofburg Palace. When tonight's session will end cannot be foreseen. It seems the delegates want to attempt to reach an agreement even tonight. What is involved here if first and foremost the adoption of a resolution about OPEC's attitude toward the industrial nations, a paper which had already been prepared this morning. Tonight's session had begun with two rounds of talks behind closed doors, one being another round of talks among the finance ministers, who continued discussion of financial aid to developing countries, and another round of talks by oil ministers, who evidently discussed the oil price situation.

Conference Extended

AU170652 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] The OPEC ministers were unable yesterday to agree on a new price formula. For this reason, the originally scheduled 2-day Vienna conference has been extended another day. Some ministers, however, have already voiced their skepticism as to whether an agreement can be reached. The foreign, finance and oil ministers of the OPEC states are primarily discussing a so-called long-term strategy for oil prices which envisages a linkage of this price with the inflation and growth rates of the most important industrial countries.

PARS Reports Proceedings

LD171036 Tehran PARS in English 0903 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Tehran, 17 Sep (PARS NEWS AGENCY)--In related news concerning the three-level OPEC ministerial conference in Vienna, PARS reported yesterday, that the three subcommittees started their work on the issues of a pricing formula for crude oil, OPEC's relations with the Third World, and a long-term strategy for OPEC.

While Dr (Shams Ardakani) from the [word indistinct] Ministry of Iran, spoke about the establishment of a crude oil pricing formula Dr Sarraf, the deputy minister of economics and finance, explained Iran's views about assistance to the Third World in another subcommittee in regard to the establishment of a special fund in which every member of OPEC would have to deposit a portion of its surplus revenues resulting from any increase in the price of oil, so that the Third World countries [word indistinct] avoid incurring any deficits in their budgets, [word indistinct] oil price increase. Meanwhile the Iranian group headed by Mo'infar, attended the general session of the conference and observed the support of Iraq and Saudi Arabia for the Western countries, the relative impartiality of Gabon, Ecuador, Qatar, Indonesia, which was followed by the United Arab emirates and Kuwait. The representative from Nigeria brought up three proposals in this session:

"Those OPEC members who enjoy surplus revenues, should not invest them in the industrialised countries for the sake of acquiring better rates of return, but rather they should study the possibilities of investment in the Third World countries.

2. Endorse the proposal on Palestine which was proposed by Iran, but we are also facing the problem of South Africa in our own continent, in which we should also be supported.

3. East-West negotiations should be established without creating a gap between OPEC members and other developing countries but, we should be careful about the maneuvers of the U.S., Britain, and West Germany in this regard. According to PARS on the spot correspondent [rest of sentence indistinct].

During yesterday's session, the policies of the hard-line and moderate members of OPEC became clear. 'Ali Akbar Mo'infar, by his objections, again prevented the Iraqi delegation from assuming the chairmanship of the conference, so the Algerian foreign minister became the chairman. He delivered a speech in which he described the positive role of OPEC in international relations, and asked for a reduction of consumption of hydrocarbons as a source of energy, and for increased research into substitutes for oil. He also wished that OPEC could perform a positive role in the continuing South-North, OECD-OPEC, and OPEC-developing countries dialogues. The delegation of Saudi Arabia, followed by those of Iraq and Kuwait stressed prompt approval of the strategy committee's proposals, which concern the relationship between OPEC and the industrialised countries, specifically the proposal to base the formula for oil price increase on the inflation rate of G.N.P. of the Western countries. On the contrary, Iran, Venezuela, Algeria, advocated a different approach stressing the relation of OPEC with the Third World countries and tried to put this subject on the conference agenda. The Algerian deputy said: It is not logical to base the oil price on the inflation rate and on the Western countries' G.N.P. because we feel a responsibility vis-a-vis the future generations.

Haqgu, the deputy minister of foreign affairs of the Islamic Republic of Iran, said in his speech that the occupier regime of gods should recognise the undeniable national rights of the nation of Palestine. Second, he stressed that the waging of provocative attacks in the explosive region of the Middle East should be halted, and that there should be effective sanctions and penalties for those who create these wars.

Conference Ends 'Without Results'

AU171116 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1000 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] The OPEC ministers conference, is ending without any tangible results in Vienna today. The 13-member states of the organization were unable to agree on the problem of a uniform oil price system. Saudi Arabia had proposed that the price of oil should be linked with the growth and inflation rates of the industrial countries.

SCHMIDT ON WARSAW PACT MANEUVERS, BELGIAN STAND ON NATO

[Excerpts] Fulda, 16 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt regrets that the Warsaw Pact did not invite Western observers to the fall maneuvers it held last week. Schmidt told a large number of journalists near Fulda today during the Bundeswehr St George maneuvers that he would have liked to have seen the Eastern side invite Western observers. He said he favors "extending" the confidence-building measures in the spirit of the Helsinki Final Act. The decisive question is the "spatial extension" of these measures "to the whole geographical region of Europe."

Asked whether the absence of the Belgians from the NATO maneuvers indicates, as newspapers have maintained, a crumbling of the Atlantic alliance, Schmidt said that that is the "wrong word" for it. The Belgians have financial troubles, and they have to save "a little bit" of money for fuel. "I don't regard this as the expression of a political development." It is an expression of a financial and economic development, and will pass. Schmidt stressed that "nothing has changed in the Belgians' basic attitude to the joint alliance." He strongly praised the good cooperation between the Americans and the soldiers of the Bundeswehr in the maneuvers.

LEADERS COMMENT ON NATO ARMAMENTS, FRG CONSCRIPTION

[Text] Fulda, 16 Sep (DPA)--Defense Minister Hans Apel said [at the Bundeswehr St George maneuvers] he was satisfied that the population had realized that maneuvers on this scale had to be held. He appealed to the troops to be careful with the crops in the fields.

Apel rejected the suggestion by the former Bundeswehr general and present director of the Institute for Peace Research in Hamburg, Wolf Graf Baudissin, that the small NATO countries should dispense with certain of the forces' arms on the grounds of economy. He could not "develop a taste for the proposal." Belgium and the Netherlands, for example, have started on a program of modernization for all three of the services' branches which will last for at least a decade. What has to be done in the 1990s does not have to be debated now. But "we must have radically new thinking" for the future. There will be a far-reaching debate on weapons for the 1990s in order to escape to some extent the pressure of costs.

Chancellor Schmidt warned about overdramatizing the forthcoming drop in the number of people eligible for conscription due to the effects of the "pill." The birthrate is rising. Apel said that the topic would only become "urgent" starting in 1986, and at the end of this decade there will have to be a number of possible solutions. There will be a greater use of reservists, and a longer period of conscription and more career soldiers will be needed. The subject of having women volunteers in the Bundeswehr in noncombat units will also have to be discussed.

GENSCHER CALLS FOR EC EFFORTS TO HALT KIM TAE-CHUNG SENTENCE

LD170932 Hamburg DPA in German 0829 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 17 Sep (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has asked the foreign ministers of the European Community to make joint representations in Seoul, together with the Federal Government, and to issue a strong warning against carrying out the death sentence on the South Korean opposition leader, Kim Tae-chung. This was announced in Bonn today by Foreign Ministry spokesman Juergen Sudhoff. Last week, Genscher instructed the Federal Republic's ambassador to South Korea to point out yet again to the government in Seoul the serious consequences for bilateral relations if the death sentence is carried out.

GENSCHER, PORTUGUESE MINISTER DISCUSS EC ACCESSION

[Excerpt] Bonn/Lisbon, 16 Sep (DPA)--The political situation in the world, including international sources of tension, were today at the center of a 2-hour exchange of views between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and his Portuguese counterpart Diogo Freitas do Amaral. During their meeting in Bonn they dealt especially with the development of the European Community and Portugals's membership in the EC. According to the Foreign Ministry, the meeting took place in a "friendly atmosphere." The two foreign ministers signed an investment protection agreement before the talks.

Speaking to journalists after the talks, Genscher expressed the hope that "important cues" will be provided by this agreement for a significant increase in German investments in Portugal which have stagnated in recent years. Prior to its desired membership in the EC, the safeguarding of Portugal's economic stability has a special role. Freitas stressed the hope that a better outlook and greater opportunities for cooperation between the two states will be possible. The Portuguese foreign minister thanked the Federal Republic for having always supported his country during its "European option."

SCHMIDT REBUTS BISHOPS' CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT

[Excerpts] Bielefeld (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has denied the German bishops' right to speak about alleged state indebtedness. If the bishops make this campaign slogan of the CDU/CSU a subject of a pastoral letter it would be in bad taste. "We do not talk about celibacy," said Schmidt tonight to an audience of 12,000 at a rally in Bielefeld. In this connection Schmidt quoted Luther, who said that to preach politics from the pulpit was for him a horror. Instead of bringing the state into debt, the government led by him has in reality made provisions for the future. Not only have 900,000 new jobs been created, but billions have been invested in roads, universities, inner cities and the environment. Only recently the Federal Government spent DM500 million on oil stocks.

In connection with the antiforeigners campaign which presently is going on in the Federal Republic--mainly in Baden-Wuerttemberg--Schmidt said that it is a "moral scandal." We must treat the foreign workers, whom we have brought into our country, decently. The Germans owe it to the children of the guest workers that they be given the same opportunities as citizens of the Federal Republic. But, added Schmidt, "we do not want any more foreigners." He said that those who falsely claimed that they were being persecuted at home must go back, just like those foreigners who cause terror in the Federal Republic.

GENSCHER WARNS CDU/CSU ON FOREIGN POLICY LINE

[Text] Bonn, 16 Sep (DPA)--Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP Chairman and federal foreign minister, has warned the (CDU/CSU) Union against "damaging the foundations of our capacity to act in foreign policy for imagined short-term advantages" in a letter to his party published in Bonn today. Genscher accuses the opposition of using foreign policy as the "flail of an immoderate internal political dispute." Anyone, such as the Union spokesmen, who calls for a reversal of German foreign policy, particularly of the policy of detente, creates uncertainty in both East and West. Genscher criticized rumors on the failure of the policy of detente in connection with the events in Poland, noting the first steps toward peacefully surmounting the internal problems could be seen.

"Shouldn't political restraint with regard to the events in Poland and readiness to offer economic assistance by the determining factor for us all?" he asked. He said it is more than a slip of the tongue when open support for a policy of safeguarding peace is denigrated as peace clap-trap, as done by CSU Chairman Franz Josef Strauss.

Genscher appealed to his party members to say to the people: "The foreign political situation, our indispensable incorporation in the European Community and in NATO and our desire for cooperation with the East on the basis of the treaties signed allow no experiments or uncertainties." Unpredictability could become a heavy burden. Genscher warned against a return to the time when "the traffic lights on the highways to Berlin were switched to red" and to a policy "in which the Hallstein doctrine paralyzed us in the Third World."

BAHR PLANS TO QUIT AS SPD FEDERAL MANAGER

DW161438 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 15 Sep 80 pp 32-34

[Excerpts] Egon Bahr plans to quit as SPD federal manager after the Bundestag elections.

SPD chief Willy Brandt was sick and tired of hearing every day something new and contradictory about the plans of his federal manager, Egon Bahr. It was said at one time that Brandt's close friend from Berlin days and Ostpolitik constructor wanted to leave SPD headquarters after 5 October. Then again Bahr said enthusiastically: "I never liked it here as much as now."

When Chancellor Helmut Schmidt asked Brandt about the intentions of the SPD manager, the chairman broke the usual rules among top-level comrades and asked directly: "Egon, will you stay or will you go?" Bahr said he would go after the elections and not wait until the party congress in the spring of 1982. If he does not reconsider this, it will eliminate a conflict that was smoldering between the barracks [SPD headquarters] and the chancellor's office since the appointment of Bahr.

After the Bundestag elections, work will be reorganized in the SPD headquarters. According to the planning of the party's top echelon, Wischnewski will handle more organizational problems once Bahr has quit, so that he as Brandt's deputy will take care of the federal manager's job.

"Ben Wisch" will simultaneously run for the job as SPD faction chairman. In doing this he wants to achieve a starting position advantage if Herbert Wehner should give up the faction chairmanship in 1981 when he will be 79. Influential SPD leaders maintain that only then will it be necessary to appoint a capable successor to Bahr.

The SPD manager already has new perspectives. Bahr told party friends that he would like to take care of his pet issue--disarmament--for a few years as a plain Bundestag deputy. In addition he is supposed to become a member of a disarmament commission which Swedish Socialist leader Olaf Palme is setting up according to the model of Brandt's North-South Commission.

BRIEFS

LOCOMOTIVES FOR TANZANIA--Bonn--The Federal Republic will provide the finance for 14 heavy diesel-electric locomotives to be used along a 546 kilometer-long hilly stretch of the Tazara railway from Dar-es-Salaam to Kapiri Moshi in Zambia. This was announced by the Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation on Tuesday. The locomotives in use today are of Chinese manufacture, cannot cope with the difficulties posed by the terrain and suffer from frequent breakdowns. It is hoped that the German locomotives will help to double the freight carried between Zambia and Tanzania from the present 900,000 to 1,800,000 tons. The engines will be delivered together with spare parts and tools as well as the supply of additional workshop materials and the necessary knownow. [Hamburg DPA in German 1516 GMT 16 Sep 80 LD]

PREMIER DENIES 'CONCILIATORY ATTITUDE' OVER AFGHANISTAN

["N.-J. B." report: "I Do Not Think That the Post Vacation Return to Work Will Be Troubled"]

[Excerpts] Selestat--On Thursday, 4 September, Raymond Barre spent almost 3 hours at the summer school in Selestat organized by the Young Giscardian Movement. Questioned on foreign policy, Mr Barre was reserved in his comments on Poland. "Silence is sometimes golden," he said, "and talking does not always solve things. We have an age-old friendship with that country and we still maintain friendly relations. The only hope I would like to express is that Poland will keep its independence and settle its international problems in full sovereignty."

With regard to the situation in Afghanistan, the government chief pointed out: "The fait accompli will not be preserved if the pressure exerted by the free world is maintained. However, good diplomacy depends on acute awareness of the available means. Dictatorial language is not a means of carrying on diplomacy.... I have heard talk of a Munich-style attitude. I can assure you that there is no tendency to adopt a conciliatory attitude in the government. France wants dialogue and a political solution but is not prepared to pay any price for peace."

GOVERNMENT TO INVESTIGATE ALLEGED TORTURE INCIDENT IN CHILE

PY162122 Paris AFP in Spanish 1656 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Ecerpts] Paris, 15 Sep (AFP)--According to what was disclosed here today by authorized sources, the French Government will request of its embassy in Chile information on how French student Michelle Jobet, who was arrested for a week by the Chilean security forces, was treated during her arrest. The same source stated that so far the French Foreign Ministry has not received any information that Jobet was tortured, but if she was the French ambassador to President Augusto Pinochet's government will present a formal protest.

According to the British daily THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH, Michelle Jobet, a biology student in Santiago de Chile, complained to a Chilean Catholic organization that she was tortured with electric shocks and was forced to undress during the questioning to which she was subjected 7 and 12 August 1980. The French Embassy in Chile has formally denied that the French student was tortured since Chile at present is concerned with improving its image abroad and would not engage in systematic torture, especially of a foreign citizen.

DRAFT BUDGET SEEN PRESAGING 'GLOOMY YEAR'

[Alain Vernholes article: "The Draft Budget"]

[Text] As far as revenues are concerned the draft budget does not contain provision for increasing the pressure on individuals; the various levels of the income tax ascale have virtually been brought into line with inflation aside from the top salaries (section taxed at the rate of 60 percent). Similarly, exemptions, deducations and allowances (for old people, invalids, single people with low incomes) have been increased by 13.3 percent. Another important provision is that families with at least three children (no longer five children) will receive an additional half of a dependent's tax allowance starting next year.

There are two tax increases: The tax on alcohol is up 9.5 percent and property values are up 11 percent for buildings and 9 percent for undeveloped land. Finally, the tax on oil companies' investment and research has been increased by Fr2 billion.

The government's economic forecasts for 1981 are based on the idea that, after industrial production in France has fallen for three or four quarters (Note 1: The fall in industrial production began at the beginning of the second quarter, although it had only been expected to start toward mid-1980), a recovery will start next year. This recovery could start in the first months of 1981 or at the latest in the spring, in other words around the time of the presidential election (Note 2: The first round of the presidential elections will take place on 26 April and the second on 10 May).

The improvement in economic activity would be set in motion by domestic consumption stimulated by a considerable increase in purchasing power. This official schedule is based on the belief in a marked falling off in price increase contrasting with the continuation of major nominal wage improvements (Note 3: The savings rate, which has dropped to a fairly low level, would rise very little in 1981: 16.2 percent of available income as against 15.6 percent in 1980 and 16.7 percent in 1979). The other factor in the recovery would be an improvement in the economic situation in all the industrialized countries, aside perhaps from Britain. At the same time there would be an increase in demand from the OPEC countries, rich from the revenue engendered by the very big oil price increases from 1979 to 1980. Investment would remain static, having neither a depressive nor an accelerating effect on economic activity after the 1979 recovery.

Of course all these forecasts are marked by considerable uncertainty. The most noteworthy are those related to oil price developments and also to the world recovery. What would happen if world inflation were to soar again instead of falling? All the Western governments would have to resolve to adopt a tougher economic policy in order to eliminate it; that would have the effect of hindering if not completely destroying the recovery.

This would seem particularly likely since, for the past 2 years, the industrialized countries' governments have been following extremely homogeneous, almost coordinated policies of which the predominant aspect is now to make individuals pay the additional oil bill resulting from each increase decided by OPEC (less increase in consumers' purchasing power), the other characteristic being to avoid excessively brutal efforts to balance payments (Note 4: After the first oil shock at the end of 1973 and beginning of 1974, the governments in many industrialized countries had, on the contrary, decided to make the state--producing massive budget deficits--and the enterprises--lower proportion of value added devoted to investment which is to the advantage of income--pay the bill, the other aspect of these policies being an abrupt attempt to redress balances of payments).

Another uncertainty is what consequences the relatively considerable investment incentive which the state will begin to give enterprises starting next month will have in 1981. The effect will certainly not be negligible, even though the tax relief which enterprises will enjoy is not due to be introduced until 1982. However, the government forecast for 1981 does not take account of the tax incentive to investment announced by the 1981 draft budget. Similarly it does not take account of some Fr5 billion in program authorizations included in the 1981 budget's economic situation action fund, which could be released around next spring if this was felt to be necessary.

On slightly disturbing factor is that, aside from the fairly clear falling off in production increases (up 2.5 percent in 1981 as against 3.5 percent in 1980) caused by mediocre industrial growth, the trade balance will again show a deficit of Fr40 to FR45 billion next year (as against Fr50-Fr55 billion this year) and the balance of current payments will show a deficit of Fr10-Fr15 billion as against Fr20-Fr25 billion this year (Mr Barre has even spoken of Fr30 billion). This slight reduction in our overseas deficits would stem almost completely from import stagnation (due to low growth), with exports rising very little.

In all, economic growth could be a little more than indicated (probably a little over 2 percent), but in any case the imbalance in overseas accounts will prevent the government from launching a recovery policy. It will, therefore, be a gloomy year, even if we are promised a recovery toward the spring.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON MEETINGS WITH IRAQ'S AD-DURI

JN162042 Baghdad Domestic Service in Arabic 1700 GMT 16 Sep 80

["Text" of joint Iraqi-Italian statement issued simultaneously in Baghdad and Rome on 16 September on Revolution Command Council Deputy Chairman 'Izzat Ibrahim's visit to Italy]

[Text] At the invitation of Italian Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga, 'Izzat Ibrahim, Revolution Command Council [RCC] deputy chairman, made an official visit to Italy at the head of a delegation from 12 to 16 September 1980. 'Izzat Ibrahim and the accompanying delegation were accorded a warm, friendly reception characterizing the relations of close cooperation existing between the two countries. Italian President Alessandro Pertini received 'Izzat Ibrahim during the visit.

The talks between the two sides headed by 'Izzat Ibrahim and Francesco Cossiga were comprehensive, frank and interesting. The talks dealt with bilateral relations, developments in the Arab and European areas and several major issues of mutual concern.

Meetings took place between RCC member and Oil Minister Tayih 'Abd al-Karim and Antonio Bisaglia, Italian minister of industry, commerce and crafts; between the RCC member and trade minister and the Italian ministers of foreign trade and government holdings; and between Foreign Minister Dr Sa'dun Hammadi and Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo.

The two sides expressed satisfaction at the development of relations between the two countries. They asserted their desire to deepen and expand aspects of cooperation between them.

The two sides carefully examined the state of bilateral relations in the various political, economic, technical and military fields. The two sides noted that there are significant possibilities for expanded cooperation between them in these fields. Accordingly, they agreed to develop long-term cooperation in these fields based on mutual interest. In order to achieve this cooperation the two sides must take immediate necessary measures.

The Italian side agreed to positively study the Iraqi programs that fall within the context of the above-mentioned fields within Italy's capabilities and its international commitments. On this occasion, the two sides believe that due to criticism raised it is necessary to state before world public opinion that the technical cooperation agreements in all fields, including nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, signed between the two countries are in line with their internaional commitments. The Italian Government undertakes to implement its agreements signed with Iraq in this regard.

The two sides discussed cooperation in the field of oil equipment. The Iraqi side agreed to study in a positive manner Italy's oil needs based on ?price rates) and in light of Iraq's capabilities and marketing programs as well as its international commitments.

The two sides noted that realizing these objectives dictates that the two countries develop the current status of their bilateral relations to a more developed and stable position.

The two sides stressed the inportance of Arab unity and the processes of integration that are taking place between Europe and other countries and the effect of these processes on bringing the two areas closer. This would positively contribute to strengthening economic development, stability and balance in international relations.

As for the Arab-European dialogue, the two sides expressed their conviction that the dialogue between the Arab and the European states must be comprehensive, particularly in the economic and political fields. The two sides noted that this dialogue is compatible with their historical and cultural heritage and responsive to the two areas' interests, their peoples' aspirations and to the requisites of their future development.

The two sides reviewed international economic issues, focusing their concern on the comprehensive North-South dialogue. They stressed the need to set up a new international economic order that would guarantee economic stability, progress, justice and equality in relations between the developing and industrial countries along the road of continuing the dialogue through a round of international negotiations on developing international economic cooperation.

The two sides discussed current international issues and exchanged views on developments in the Arab area. They agreed that a just and lasting peace cannot be realized without the Zionist forces' withdrawal from all the occupied Arab territories and a guarantee of the legitimate and national rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination.

The two sides agreed to exchange periodic visits and meetings at the highest level to strengthen and develop the relations binding their two countries for the sake of consolidating peace and stability in the world.

Ibrahim extended an invitation to Francesco Cossiga to pay an official visit to Iraq. The invitation was gratefully accepted.

PCI LEADERS CRITICIZE COSSIGA GOVERNMENT

Berlinguer Speech

AU150917 Rome ANSA in English 0845 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Text] Rome, 15 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer reiterated his party's categorical opposition to the current government in a speech delivered at the close of the national "Festa Del L'UNITA" in Bologna Sunday. The two-week festival is held annually to raise funds for the party's L'UNITA.

Berlinguer did not skip one of the PCI's polemics against the Christian Democrat Party and the government in recent months. (The coalition headed by Premier Francesco Cossiga includes his own Christian Democrats, the Socialists and Republicans).

"Our opposition to this government will not be attenuated and will continue with the necessary vigor until it falls. (The Cossiga government) was formed in the wake of the victory of the party's most forcefully anticommunist faction at the DC congress and this is the cause of our opposition. It is evident that our attitude could be different towards a government that does not have such negative political inspiration that aims to split the masses and especially which gives some sign of greater seriousness in coping with the nation's most urgent problems."

As for the format of a new government, Berlinguer said, "Do not have formulas to propose for government in which we are not included. We base our judgements and will continue to do so on deeds".

Among the "deeds", Berlinguer cited the crisis at Fiat, acceptance of Communist amendments to the government's economic decree, an end to party patronage in assigning posts in state-run organizations, banks, the forming regional governments in Ligura, Marche, Lazio and Calabria, and a positive stance on the problem of Euromissiles.

Berlinguer also spoke of terrorism, of the August two Bologna railroad station massacre and criticized the minister of justice who keeps "the Bologna magistrates office in a veritable state of indigence."

On the economic front, the PCI secretary recalled that not more than two weeks ago "ministers and members of the government parties tried to show that the autumn will not be so bleak... an effort directed solely at giving a little more oxygen to a comatose government".

With respect to the situation at the Fiat automaker, where management wants to layoff 24,000 workers in the next eighteen months, Berlinguer said that negotiations with the mediation of the government must not "leave workers in the dark. Workers and public opinion must be able to know and control the various stages of the talks".

In other political speeches, Social Democrat Pierluigi Romita also critized the government and said that "conditions must be created for a broader majority including the entire socialist and democratic area committed to a joint action which will give it sufficient weight to deal with both the DC and PCI".

Public Works Minister Francesco Compagna (Republican) aired positive views on the government speaking in Naples and said that the Republicans do not appreciate "excemporaneous attempts that are surfacing to trigger a government crisis".

State (Public Sector Industry) Minister Gianni de Michelis (Socialist) defended in an interview appearing today the current government, which "whatever the Communists say about it, it has coped with and solved situations. It improved the economic decrees which are in effect specific answers to problems".

Napolitano Press Conference

LD121125 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 10 Sep 80 pp 1, 16

["C.F." report on PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano 9 September Rome press conference on 9 September PCI Directorate meeting in Rome: "Out With This Government and New Political Options Right Away"]

[Excerpts] Rome--"Recently there has been relatively broad acknowledgment of the need for more positive relations with the PCI, in view of the problems facing the country and parliament. We appreciate this acknowledgment, but nevertheless we add that as far as we are concerned it is deeds that count. This means first that there is a pressing need for a different kind of government from the present one, which has failed to build positive relations with the opposition and which is manifestly unsatisfactory and worn out." This is how Giorgio Napolitano illustrated to journalists at PCI headquarters the significance of the PCI directorate meeting, while proceedings were still in progress on other points of the agenda.

Another condition for achieving a different kind of relations with the Communists, he added, is specific political acts that really mark a reversal of the trend compared to the recent history of decisive topics such as the antiterrorist struggle, the functioning of the institutions and foreign policy, including detente and international cooperation. This domestic and international framework required and still requires a correct dialectic between majority and opposition, but instead relations have deteriorated "on other people's initiative."

Above all, there must be no delay. In answer to the question whether the PCI will reserve judgment of a future government until it has started to work, Napolitano said that the acts demanded by the PCI must be carried out "first by the parties." "And the first act remains precisely the replacement of the present government, since as long as it remains in power the conditions for a different and more fruitful dialectic cannot exist." "Enrico Berlinguer will talk about these issues in Bologna tomorrow," he added. In answer to a journalist's question, he said: "Be that as it may, a new government must not be just 'another government,' but an executive that represents a clear development with regard to its platform, structure and political conduct." In any case, even before a different government is formed the parties of the present majority "can make significant gestures on the local administrations, the publishing laws and the economic plan: There are already ways of demonstrating a change, a desire to break away from the logic of the 'preamble' group. As far as the communists are concerned, they have no desire for mere political skirmishes."

Finally, answering a question on Pland, Napolitano said: "We must not indulge in facile optimism. The Polish situation is complicated, but we must acknowledge the positive nature of the solution that has been found. First, because there was no foreign intervention from either side, and this is a good sign for detente in international relations. It is also hoped that this solution will lead to institutional and political changes that will strengthen the democratic spirit."

NAPOLITANO LINKS IMPROVED PSI RELATIONS WITH LEFTIST UNITY

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano undated interview with Rome magazine L'ASTROLABIO: "Craxi Too 'Optimistic' About Government's Future"]

[Text] Rome-- "Craxi's assertion that this government is sure to survive until the Socialist Party Congress seems rather optimistic to me." Indeed, one is prompted to wonder "how long can a government survive that is continually resorting to votes of confidence because it has no confidence in the majority that supports."

This is what Giorgio Napolitano stresses in an interview granted to L'ASTROLABIO based on relations within the Italian left in connection both with the PSI's participation in the present three-party government and with the question of its links with the DC's present leadership group, the preamble group.

Napolitano stresses the "confidence" with which even recently the Socialist secretary spoke about the nation's political balances, making no mention of the contradictions and instances of disunity within the government majority.

Craxi should realize, he says, that "an improvement in relations with the Communist opposition is extremely unlikely as long as we have a government that has characterized itself in the way the present Cossiga government has." The issue of the Socialist Party's political approach is certainly a broader one, but it too must be assessed on the basis of the Socialists' conduct with respect to the government. The best proof of the PSI's willingness to regard "government cooperation with the DC as something imposed by force of circumstances, definitely of limited duration and to be accompanied by a serious effort to achieve unity on the left, the best proof of such an approach (if it really is the prevalent approach within the PSI) can be given by the Socialist Party by working for a government that is not so evidently characterized by the line of the 'preamble' forces."

At present, Napolitano observes, there is no question regarding the Communists' opposing stance, because "we see no conditions for our government participation." At the moment the most topical issue concerns "a possible improvement of the political climate, a more relaxed and open dialectic between the majority and the communist opposition, which demands, however, a number of specific political actions by the majority parties."

In this situation the hypothesis of leftwing unity now finds "its principal point of contradition in the harshness of relations between the government and the communist opposition." And the Socialist Party has only managed "rather infrequently" to differentiate itself from the DC in the government's work. Therefore if the PSI, partly with a view to its national congress, "intends to confirm a line which is not very different from the line established at the previous congress in Turin," it must also work to ensure that "in this phase of Italian political life there is a government capable of more positive relations with the Communist opposition."

L'UNITA CITES PROBLEM AREAS AT MADRID CSCE MEETING

LD121527 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 9 Sep 80 pp 1, 16

[Augusto Pancaldi dispatch: "East and West Round a Table"]

[Excepts] Madrid--This morning sees the opening at the conference center of the preparatory phase of the CSCE conference, the second verification of the implementation of the Helsinki accords, following the one in Belgrade in 1978.

The determination of some countries, such as France and especially the FRG, to keep the current of East-West dialogue alive--despite the U.S. pressures and the absence of a "European" initiative in this direction--and Brezhnev's overture to Schmidt for an unconditional resumption of talks on medium-range missiles, given a further thrust by the CPSU central committee's 25 August declaration (the Soviet Union "is willing to resolve by negotiation all the problems in Europe and Asia and in other areas," to "continue and intensify the political dialogue between countries with different social systems" and to begin at once "negotiations on medium-range nuclear weapon system in Europe in direct relation to the U.S. forward base nuclear weapon systems") have made it possible not only to set the stranded vessel of the Madrid conference in motion again but also to give it a possible new content of detente, apart from what is provided for in the review of the implementation of the Helsinki accords.

On the eve of the opening of the preparatory phase, moreover, the events in Poland have added anxieties and hopes regarding how the conference will evolve--anxieties, because any kind of administrative solution to the Polish social and political crisis could freeze the resumption of the detente process again (in this connection the cancellation of the Schmidt-Gierek and Schmidt Honecker talks has certanly not facilitated the preparatory phase of the conference); and hopes, because the importance of the agreements reached between the Polish government and workers and the release of the dissidents arrested during the strikes constitute an element of credibility that could exert a not inconsiderable incluence in Madrid when the time comes to discuss the part of the Helsinski accords concerning human issues and rights; indeed, everyone knows that it was on this subject that the Belgrade conference reached deadlock, and that it will be on this subject again that the most intensive and harshest confrontation will take place.

In this connection one cannot fail to observe a danger: The eyes of the West will all be on Warsaw during the weeks of the Madrid conference, and any negative change in the situation inherited by the new Polish leaders would provide the many adversaries of detente with an excuse for making Madrid the tomb of East-West dialogue.

This is the "visible" part of the international context within which the preparatory phase of the Madrid conference is opening. The invisible part--no less important in view of the general instability--concerns the elections in the FRG in October and in the United States in November. If one bears in mind that at the end of the Belgrade conference the conservative press of the entire world accused the Western governments of "capitulation to the USSR," it is obvious that neither Schmidt's nor, still less, Carter's representatives can commit themselves to a constructive dialogue in Madrid before the election results are known.

Hence the prospect of a lengthy observation phase during which electoral and propaganda motives threaten to distort the course of the debate and to hinder preparatory negotiations; hence also the danger of this preparatory phase being limited to the mere definition of an agenda and organization of the conference proper, without its providing the necessary political and technical preparation for a qualitative step forward in the development of the detente process. Last, we must not forget that some Western countries, headed by the United States, are preparing to raise the Afghan issue to create problems for the Soviet Union and its allies from the very outset of the dialogue.

Despite this tangle of problems, the Madrid Conference is linked with the great hope of sooner or later reviving the confidence and spirit of Helsinki as a basis for strengthening detente and second, of extending political detente to military detente. In this connection the Eastern bloc countries will insist that Madrid produce an agreement on an all-Europe arms reduction conference, while France will call for a conference on measures to increase security as a precondition for any other meeting on disarmement in Europe.

Despite the crises and successes, anxieties and hopes, storms and bright periods, the Europe which asserted itself in Helsinki was nevertheless a Europe convinced of the need for East-West dialogue as a guarantee of detente and peace. It is essential in Madrid that Europe rediscover itself through a political determination to continue along the same path and to extend its outlines. The alternative to this option is cold war, with the costs and dangers which accompany it.

PRESIDENT EANES ANNOUNCES DECISION TO SEEK REELECTION

LD161413 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 5 Sep 80 p 3, 8

[Text] "Whoever wins the elections must agree to govern. This is the responsibility shouldered by whoever presents himself to the voters," General Ramlaho Eanes said yesterday during the ceremony at the Belem Palace during which he agreed to stand for reelection to the presidency of the republic. Having stated that he lives "with pride in a country based on obligatory democratic laws which defend the freedom that worthy people demand," Eanes stressed that "the political parties, as an expression of the people's will and of social interests, are an essential part of the democratic order and normality, especially when they take on government responsibilities or the no-less-worthy functions of the opposition."

The president of the republic began by saying that there have been "many and, and as far as I am concerned, very flattering" requests made to him to agree to submit himself again to the Portuguese people's vote.

"Now Prof Henrique de Barros, a democrat who has never compromised with the dictates of his conscience, has just repeated this request on behalf of those present. I reply unhesitatingly that I accept the responsibility implied by your request and your support. In November I will stand for reelection to the presidency of the republic.

"I am taking this decision for reasons of political and personal consistency which it is my duty to present to you and which, as an unquestionable democratic requirement, I submit for consideration by all the Portuguese people.

"Because the responsibility which I accept, imposed by my conscience and justified by your support, admits of no compromises or ambiguities, I wish to make quite clear the nature of my commitment to democracy, to the Portuguese people and to Portugal.

"I live with pride in a country based on obligatory democratic laws which defend the freedom which worthy people demand and which, through the clear rules of democratic legitimacy, define the conditions for the accession to and exercises of political power. It was for this that the historical figures who have formed our awareness as democrats struggled for so many years. It was for this that 25 April took place. It was for this that 25 November [defeat of attempted leftist coup] took place. It was for this that I stood as a candidate in 1976."

"Naturally this is my first and foremost commitment: the guarantee that there will be no deviation from order or democratic normality during the years of my next period of office.

"This is the prime reason for my decision, since I do not doubt, and have never doubted, that only under democracy and with complete integrity of the democratic rules can Portugal tackle successfully--at the same time strengthening the dignity of its independence--the grave problems which we will all have to resolve."

After referring to the importance of the political parties in exercising power or in opposition, Eanes asserted that for this reason "the independence of my position and the firmness of the commitments which I undertake directly to the entire Portuguese people would neither make sense nor be democratically responsible if they did not have the approval and support of party organizations committed to upholding freedom and democratic pluralism." The president emphasized that he deems "the ethical imperative of upholding democracy" indisputable at the personal level, "but I could not fail to consider also that at the political level there were and are sufficient preconditions for the candidates for the post of president of the republic to be prominent leaders of political parties."

"Accordingly I would not accept the political responsibility of running again if I had not received from democratic party organizations the expression of their support, their support, their espousal of the principles governing my political activity and the certainty which they give me that my independent candidacy is an essential contribution to guaranteeing democratic stability."

And he continued: "I accept that political support from party organizations, associations, political groups and independent personalities, respecting the principles common to us which I have always expressed and have always sought to carry out throughout my term of office.

"I obviously reject and have rejected any support from parties and personalities who are not committed to the pluralist concepts of political activity and the rules of the legitimation of the institutions through free, direct and universal suffrage and who do not fully accept the requirements of peaceful and tolerant coexistence among the entire Portuguese people."

Following these assertions the president said: "I obviously reject, as I have always rejected, authoritarianism and totalitarianism, whether rightwing or leftwing, whether clearly expressed or merely implicit in the stances of their political representatives."

"I obviously reject Manichaeanism and threats of revenge, and I reject reactionary violence, just as I reject revolutionary violence." And he continued: "It is within this framework of principles that I conceive the president of the republic's responsibility."

"Submitted to the electorate by a group of citizens who identify with him at the level of principles and elected by direct and universal suffrage, the president of the republic must not be the representative of a faction, a factor of disunity or a protector of groups which oppress or collaborate in oppressing the rights and interests of other Portuguese people.

"The president of the republic--as the president, which he is, of the entire Portuguese people and as supreme representative of the democratic state--must be an active agent of political and social balance. He must be a permanent guarantee of judicious [illegible], a source of calm and, above all, a creator of the areas of consensus and moderation essential for resolving the situations of tension which Portuguese society will experience.

"He is not a neutral and passive institutional figure.

"He is a democratic president with a program which guides him--the program with which he presents himself to the Portuguese people's electoral judgment.

"He has aims which he achieves through the promotion of specific actions and his relationship with the government, the Assembly of the Republic, the governments of the autonomous regions, the local authorities, the economic and social agents and all citizens."

He then explained in this connection: "For this very reason, the president of the republic must be endowed with an essential ability to negotiate, so as to be able to promote cooperation among different interests in performing national tasks."

"Negotiation is a normal democratic activity; it is proof of respect for others; it is the sign of modesty on the part of those who are calm enough to recognize that only though cooperation among everybody and only by strengthening the national community's ties of solidarity as far as is possible and compatible can Portugal recover and be made greater.

"Openness to negotiation is the guarantee of peace and security.

"On the other hand, intolerance, dogmatism, rejection of dialogue, oppression and the desire to assert an imaginary superiority are the typical manifestations of those who never rule out coercion to avert open and frank dialogue with others."

Eanes maintained that it is necessary for the head of state's political conceptions to be clearly known so that Portugal can meet the challenges of its European integration--something which he had the opportunity to do "consistently" throughout his first term of office.

Eanes then stated that "our future development, social justice, stability and, more specifically, the preconditions for a revision of the constitution in keeping with Portugal's needs, very substantially depend on" the president of the republic's ability "to create agreements and his ability to organize and mobilize."

"On them depends, last, the full involvement in political life of many men and women whom Portugal needs and who have withdrawn from public involvement, disenchanted by the constant quarrels of personalities and by the ambitions for personal power which, inherited from an authoritarian past, have wilted the hope which was reborn with democracy.

"If this is my conception of what is appropriate for Portugal at the present time, my full respect for the instructions and imperatives of the democratic rules is no less determined. With the same calm and clarity that I set out my principles and my ethical guidelines, I assert that to refuse to accept government responsibilities in view of my reelection is to violate the most elementary democratic rule--that of serving the country.

"And if in successive elections the Portuguese people were to choose political leaders with not entirely coinciding views, it would be an elementary requirement of democratic responsibility and of respect for the processes of legitimation for these political leaders to seek the foundations for an agreement clearly indicated by those successive ballots.

"As president of the republic I have no hesitation in asserting that I am bound, with respect to democracy and the Portuguese people, by an institutional commitment which requires a positive relationship between my position and any legitimate government.

"But I assert with equal determination that there can be no political solidarity with anybody who expresses and builds a view of a Portuguese society split between the good and the bad and a confrontation marked by intolerance and violence."

Ramalho Eanes then broached the issue of the alleged agreement with the Communist Party. He said: "My answer is simple but firm: It is untrue."

"The Communist Party will never be able to expect more from my duties as president of the republic than the guaranteeing of the democratic rules; that is, that it will be respected as an expression of a section of the Portuguese people, provided that it observes democratic legality.

"It can expect no more and should expect no less.

"But if this is sufficient to justify votes on the part of the Communist electorate, it must be concluded that it has reasons for voting for somebody who guarantees democracy and party pluralism.

"For my part I refuse to share the warped opinion that those who are not with us are against us.

"My political conceptions are not directed against a righwing bloc or in favor of a left-wing bloc but--and I believe this has been proved--toward seeking a stable and lasting consensus among the central and democratic forces of Portuguese society.

"For this reason I do not accept the questioning of my motives by those who create the situations for which they afterward seek to blame me.

"The democratic reality is simple: The presidential elections are not ballots for parties.

"The immediate reality is no less simple: It is not I, nor those who undertake the responsibility of supporting me on the basis of the principles which I have always upheld, who can be held responsible for choosing the profiles, qualities and political characteristics of other candidates who are announced."

The president concluded his speech by mentioning the role of the military personnel who assisted him "in consolidating Portuguese democracy," none of whom, he stressed, was present. And he emphasized: "I myself, as the reelected president of the republic, will relinquish the military functions which I decided to undertake during the present term of office."

"With the upcoming revision of the constitution, the politico-military functions which party leaders wished to be institutionalized in now forgotten difficult times will end.

"For my part I do not forget all those who with loyalty, dignity, firmness and courage have defended and guaranteed democracy.

"Because history will not forget that the doors of democracy were reopened in April 1974, I undertake the responsibility toward all those who have intransigently upheld the values of freedom since then of running again, continuing the hope which was reborn for Portugal."

CONGRESSIONAL SESSION BEGINS DISCUSSION OF VOTE OF CONFIDENCE

LD161642 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1600 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Text] The plenary session of the Congress of Deputies, in which the prime minister is seeking a vote of confidence from the house, has now begun. Juan Ramon de la Cuadra reports:

At 1745, that is, with the customary delay for reasons of courtesy, the plenary session started. During this session, as we have said, Prime Minister Suarez will seek the confidence of the chamber after the recent cabinet crisis. Speaker of the House Lavilla declared the session open. Then the secretary of the house read out the rules decreed by the speaker and officials in the absence of formal rules, which are still in the course of being drafted.

At this point, with the benches practically all full and with many senators present also, Prime Minister Suarez mounted the rostrum and, in an atmosphere of great expectation, began his address, saying that he was appearing to seek a vote of confidence, using for this purpose an exceptionally important constitutional procedure because he wanted the Spanish people to know the goals his government was setting itself. He defined these as fourfold: the first, to overcome the economic crisis; the second, to develop the constitution with special reference to its provisions for autonomy; the third, to combat terrorism using all available legal means and to create a climate of civil security; and the fourth, to continue pursuing an active foreign policy. However, Suarez said that not all these points would be the subject of the confidence motion, but only the first two, that is overcoming the economic crisis and developing constitutional development with special reference to regional autonomy.

Suarez Speech

LD161918 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Excerpts] The prime minister's speech to the Congress of Deputies ended a few minutes ago. We shall now summarize for you the main points of Prime Minister Suarez' speech. Let us say first of all that this was a cool and well-documented speech, well put together and perfectly structured. It fell into two clearly differentiated parts, the first dealing with economic issues and the second with political matters. In the first part on economic issues, the prime minister, set out a number of general criteria or broad guidelines on the government's intentions or aims in the economic field with a view to tackling the crisis. Briefly, let us now sum up the main guidelines shaping this policy:

"No" to state intervention in the public sector; "yes," on the other hand, to greater freedom for economic forces; encouragement of investment and exports as a first step to reviving demand for goods and services, which in turn will generate employment; greater flexibility in the financial system. The prime minister singled out as the most urgent task that of creating jobs--a task he assigns primarily to private initiative though also to the public sector. He even said--this is one point he made--that some defense spending will be put off in order to further this effort to create jobs.

On political matters, Suarez outlined his general ideas and, in contrast to what he said on economic matters, he spoke here of aims and listed them. Leaving aside the general ideas, his aims are as follows: priority for the legislative development of two institutions fundamental to the development of public freedoms, namely the Ministry of Justice and the judiciary; government support for the statute of public freedoms; the promise that during the present parliamentary session the government will propose to the Cortes the draft bill on the economic and social council; a drive on the part of the government to push through the transference on autonomy matters. On the subject of autonomies, he also said the government will accept the exercise of the principle of equality.

The government will also push through the processes of autoromy which are still being undertaken. To this end he gave a time limit: before 1983, when the next elections are scheduled and when the first term after the previous general elections comes to an end. The processes of administrative decentralization will be accelerated; there will be a wide-ranging reform of the public administration.

PSOE, PCE Leaders Comments

LD162242 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Excerpts] For Felipe Gonzalez, leader of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party, Prime Minister Suarez' speech merited the following opinion:

[Begin recording] For me, what he has done is to contradict himself, since he says he is going to continue with his previous policy, and we know the shortcomings of that previous policy. So while he runs the risk of incurring the same criticism, he is trying to give his policies a new image. So I would say this is more of an image-boosting operation than one concerned with content, all of this within the limits of the self-contradictions in which the government is operating. And then it strikes me that this speech contained much more rhetoric than reality. [end recording]

For his part, Santiago Carrillo, secretary general of the Spanish Communist Party, said the following:

[Begin recording] The prime minister seems to accept a point of view which we have been putting to his administrations, namely, that the solution to the problem of unemployment, and of the need to increase demand, lies only in an increase in public investment. On other matters, the prime minister's speech is a catalogue of intentions which in some respects causes us alarm, above all those which refer to wages, which the prime minister evidently proposes to reduce and hold down. In any event, we are going to meet to study this speech. The underlying problem is not so much what the prime minister has said here, but the lack of confidence which the country has that one party--the Union of the Democratic Center--alone is capable of resolving the present problems.

INTER-CYPRIOT TALKS RESUME IN NICOSIA 16 SEPTEMBER

NC161552 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Text] This afternoon, the inter-Cypriot talks resumed at the Ledra Palace Hotel in Nicosia, with the first subject for discussion the resettlement of Varosha's Greek Cypriot inhabitants.

In a statement prior to the talks, Gobbi, special envoy of the UN secretary general in Cyprus, expressed restrained optimism over the outcome of the negotiations and added that he did not expect early results. Gobbi said: The resumption of the talks is a step forward: let us face the future with restrained optimism.

In his statement, Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriots' representative to the talks, hoped that this time it would be possible to hold constructive talks in a way that would lead to positive results. He added: The Greek Cypriots' position is to solve the Cypriot problem in a dignified and fair way and for this reason we come to the talks with a spirit of good will and with the political will to arrive at a solution that would be to the benefit of both communities and of all the island's people. Ioannidhis concluded: I take this opportunity to convey a message of good will and friendship to the Turkish Cypriot community. I hope and expect that we will manage to achieve some results despite the numerous difficulties in the way of the road leading to peace.

Answering pertinent questions, Onan, the Turkish Cypriots' representative, said that during today's discussion on Varosha, it would be the Greek Cypriot side that would explain its views. He added: After this, we will have a discussion and submit our own proposals.

Answering another question, Onan said that events in Turkey were an internal affair of Turkey and that he did not think that they would affect the talks.

Taking part in the meeting are Gorge, deputy special Envoy of the UN secretary general in Cyprus; Mr Triandafillidhis and Mrs Soulioti, the Greek Cypriots' advisers to the talks; constitutional expert Mr Palley; Mr Soysal and Mr Ertekun, Mr Onan's advisers; and Mr Esat Fellaoglu, a land survey expert and director of the Turkish Cypriot Land Registry Office.

Today's meeting lasted 1 hour. After the meeting, it was announced that the next meeting would take place on Wednesday, 24 September, at 1600. The subject of the next meeting will be practical measures for restoring confidence between both communities.

UN Communique After Talks

TA161659 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1630 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot interlocutor at the Cyprus intercommunal talks, Mr Onan, has said that the Turkish side would certainly put forward its proposals on any subject to be discussed. Mr Onan was speaking at the Ledra Palace [Hotel] this afternoon before the beginning of the first of the four weekly meetings aimed at finding a peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem.

Asked as to what was to be discussed today, Mr Onan said that the first item on the agenda which would be taken by rotation was Varosha and they would be discussing it. He stated that he did not know whether the Greek Cypriot side would be putting forward any proposals and that it was the Greek Cypriots' turn to do so.

Asked whether the recent events in Turkey would affect the talks, he said that the events in Turkey were an internal matter and that he did not think they would have any affect on the outcome of the Cyprus talks or constitution.

The Greek Cypriot interlocutor said that they hoped and expected that this time the talks would be constructive and in a manner leading to some positive results. He added that the Greek Cypriot side wanted a decent and just solution of the Cyprus problem and that they were attending the talks with the political willingness to arrive at a solution which will be to the benefit of both communities.

The UN special representative in Cyprus, Mr Hugo Gobbi, said before the meeting that he was hopeful, but did not expect a quick result. Taking into consideration the experiences of the past and the magnitude of the interests involved, one had to be cautious. He stressed that an important step had been made by the renewal of the talks. [Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek at 1600 GMT on 16 September, adds that Gobbi "expressed satisfaction over the good atmosphere that previaled at today's meeting."]

The interlocutors, their advisers and the UN special representative then began their meeting. The meeting lasted 1 and 1/4 hours, at the end of which the following UN communique was issued.

As agreed at the meeting on 9th August, 1980, and pursuant to a procedure, consideration of the third point of the agenda, namely reaching agreement on the resettlement of Varosha under UN auspices in accordance with the provisions of point five of the 19th May agreement, was begun at today's meeting. It was agreed to hold future meetings on Wednesday and therefore the next meeting will take place on the 24th of September at 1600 at which the second point of the agenda will be considered, namely initial practical measures by both sides to promote good will, mutual confidence and return to normal conditions in accordance with the provisions of point six of the 19th May agreement, which states that special importance will be given to these matters.

The secretary general's special representative expressed satisfaction about the good atmosphere which prevailed during today's deliberations.

TURKISH CYPRIOT URGES UN NOT TO DISCUSS CYPRUS

TA170750 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0415 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus representative in New York Nail Atalay has noted that the discussion of the Cyprus problem at the UN General Assembly could adversely affect the intercommunal talks, which have resumed after a long break. Atalay sent a letter on this subject to the UN General Assembly chairmanship and asked that the Cyprus problem not be discussed at the UN General Assembly.

Pointing out that if the Cyprus problem is included in the agenda of the General Assembly, the issue should be referred to the special political committee and equal rights should be granted to the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities, Atalay said: The method so far employed at the UN General Assembly is contrary to the equality principle at the intercommunal talks and prevented the Turkish Cypriot views from being expressed at the General Assembly and a meaningful discussion from being held. Meaningful and constructive decisions at the UN General Assembly can only be secured by allowing both communities to express their views under equal conditions.

GOVERNMENT REJECTS REQUESTED DEBATE ON TURKEY

[Text] The government considers unacceptable and unrealistic any connection between the situation prevailing in our country today and developments which led to the Turkish military coup.

This response was given by the government spokesman yesterday to PASOK, which requested a special chamber of deputies debate in order to condemn the Turkish coup and in order to proclaim that "all Greeks are united--the people and the armed forces--in the defense not only of our national liberty but also of human liberty."

The Government's Position

The government issued the following answer to the above proposal:

"For formal as well as for fundamental reasons the government does not consider any chamber of deputies debate on the Turkish situation to be either feasible or expedient.

"The formal reasons have to do with the fact that the chamber of deputies is not meeting in plenum. From the expediency point of view such a debate would serve no purpose because:

"1. Through the statement of its foreign minister the government officially expressed its position on Turkish developments in the same way that all other parties did. Consequently the opinion of all parties has been expressed.

"2. It considers unacceptable and unrealistic any connection between the situation prevailing in our country today and developments which led to the Turkish military coup.

"There is neither terrorism nor violence in our country because the government discouraged terrorists and protected a calm political life well in time. In addition the country's armed forces remain devoted to their national duty."

PASOK's Proposal

At the beginning of yesterday's meeting of the chamber of deputies summer session, PASOK's parliamentary representative requested on behalf of A. Papandreou that a special chamber of deputies meeting should be held in order to allow "the chamber to express itself on the coup which took place in Turkey." After describing the government's statements on the issue as "a lukewarm condemnation" Alevras added that the chamber "which expresses the universal thoughts of the nation and the Greek people should express itself and state that all the Greeks, the people and the armed forces, are united in the defense of not only our national liberty but also of human liberty."

D. Papaspirou, the chamber's chairman, observed that the government must be informed of the essence of the request by PASOK--reminding PASOK that its request falls under the jurisdiction of the plenum of the chamber and not its summer session.

Alevras argued it is essential that the chamber should issue such a resolution stressing that "as of the other day the entire Greek nation started to feel a certain awe and a chill over what is happening. At a time you see the youth uprising, at a time when you see all representative bodies protesting, do you not think that you degrade the chamber which appears hypnotized and silent in face of such a great issue?" he concluded.

K. Kappos of the KKE-Exterior stated his party supports the request by PASOK.

FLORAKIS CONDEMNS TURKISH COUP; KKE CALLS FOR PROTEST

AT161424 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Excerpts] Expressions of support by the Greek people toward the Turkish people are reaching a climax. These expressions now take the form of an open condemnation of the efforts of the government and its propagandists to justify the military coup and to cover up the leading role of the Americans. A large scale meeting of solidarity with the Turkish people will be held at 1800 today at the gates of Athens University under the initiative of the EFEE, the National Student Union of Greece.

Kharilaos Florakis, secretary general of the Central Committee of the KKE-Exterior made the following statement to the "Visnews" Television Agency on the Turkish military coup:

"It is well known that the stratocrats in Turkey played a part in the country's political life--but only from the sidelines. By abolishing democratic freedoms they now play their part on center stage. The military coup in Turkey confirms the fact that when the ruling class feels its privileges threatened, then it does not hesitate to cast democracy, democratic freedoms, the plurality of political parties and human rights into the wastebasket. This coup reveals how hypocritical the argument is that NATO is allegedly the defender of human rights. The example in Turkey, like the previous coup in our country, proves that NATO inspires such interventions and that it cooperates with the stratocrats in their implementation.

"We are concerned over the fate of workers in Turkey. We are also concerned over what will happen to the problems which remain pending in the eastern Mediterranean. Over and above other reasons the coup in Turkey was undertaken in order to facilitate implementation of solutions to these problems in accordance to the interests of the U.S. and NATO imperialists. We express our solidarity with the working class and the workers of Turkey."

BULGARIAN DELEGATION AGREES TO EXPANDED CULTURAL TIES

AT170800 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Text] New prospects are opening up for closer cultural Greek-Bulgarian relations through expanded cultural and scientific exchanges. This was stressed today in statements to the press by the Minister of Culture and Science Andrianopoulos after his long conference with Lyudmilla Zhivkova, culture minister of Bulgaria and daughter of President Zhivkov [as received], who is visiting Greece at the head of a delegation of experts on cultural affairs. During the meeting it was decided to make mutual cultural contacts more intensive and fundamental. It was specifically stressed there is a need that cultural relations should contribute to an improvement and expansion of cultural relations between the two countries. Mrs Zhivkova characteristically stressed: "We will not simply add another small stone but rather we will add an entire rock." The minister of culture and science was invited to visit Bulgaria and to attend various events. Tomorrow Zhivkova will be received by President Karamanlis and will also meet Prime Minister Rallis and Education Minister Talliadhouros.

GENERAL EVREN ANSWERS QUESTIONS AT NEWS CONFERENCE

TA161743 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Replies by Gen Kenan Evren, head of state, chief of staff and National Security Council president, to questions asked by foreign and domestic press and television correspondents at the end of his statement during a news conference today at the Prime Ministry--questions read, summarized by announcers; Evren answers recorded]

[Text] [Announcer] A journalist asked Evren when the preparation of a temporary constitution and the establishment of a constituent assembly would be completed.

[Evren] You will appreciate that providing a definite date on these matters could mislead both you and my citizens. However, you should be particularly confident that, as I pointed out earlier, the Turkish Armed Forces do not intend to discharge this duty for a long time and abandon its basic duty. All possible efforts will be exerted to conclude these in the shortest possible time.

[Announcer] A journalist asked what the future of the political party leaders, who are being being held in detention, would be.

[Evren] I believe I have already stated, in my previous speeches, that the activities of all political parties have been stopped for the time being. I did not say they were closed down. I said their activities have been stopped. I said that after the election law, the political parties law and the constitution have been prepared, party activities will be allowed to resume at a given time--sufficient to allow them to make their preparations--before the elections. As for the condition of the party leaders, this method was resorted to for their own security. They are not being detained. They are moving around freely in their place of abode. However, their presence in Ankara in this atmosphere could create certain inconveniences from the viewpoint of their own security. As a result of the excitement of the first day, certain ugly acts--which occurred in the past--could have recurred. Therefore, we considered it suitable that the party leaders stay in such a place until the atmosphere is calm. However, I can say that we will return them to their homes in a very short time. I cannot give a specific time for this. We are continuing to receive information from throughout the country every day. As soon as we enter into a more tranquil and normal state, we will return them to Ankara.

[Announcer] Another journalist asked Evren whether they [the military leaders] intend to change the economic stability program.

[Evren] A program has been determined and a path chosen. Steps are being taken on this path. Efforts will be exerted to overcome the small obstacles which could appear on this path. However, unless we do encounter a major obstacle--a big wall--we will not deviate from this economic program. If some parts of these measures do not go smoothly, then efforts will be exerted to eliminate these parts.

[Announcer] In reply to another question, General Evren said that the members of the National Security Council will be sworn in on 18 September. In reply to a journalist who asked about the measures to prevent parliamentary bottlenecks in the future, General Evren replied:

[Evren] As you know, in the past presidential elections in democratic countries reached a deadlock as they did in our country. However, every country found a remedy to this problem. Unfortunately we have not found a remedy because these elections are based on good will. However, good will is not sufficient in all cases. Certain sanctions should be taken. As you know elections were recently held in Greece. If a solution was not reached after three sessions the parliament would have been dissolved. The presidential elections issue can be solved without such a long delay through similar--I am not saying that the same system be applied--legal procedures.

We shall introduce such a legal measure. In addition, we also intend to take measures to prevent regrettable acts--not approved by the nation--which will prevent deputies from attending assembly sessions whenever they wish or from appearing at the roll call and then leaving.

[Announcer] Another journalist asked whether or not political party leaders will be prosecuted in the event criminal evidence is brought against them. General Evren replied as follows:

[Evren] Criminal evidence [words indistinct] you know, everyone is equal before the law. If a party leader has committed a crime, of course he has to give an account in accordance with the laws. From this point of view, there is no discrimination.

[Announcer] In reply to a journalist who recalled that the academic year has started and asked whether any measure is being considered in connection with teachers who attempt to preach ideas other than Ataturkism to their students, National Security Council President General Evren said:

[Evren] If our existing teachers do not become the tools of extreme ideologies--as has been the case in previous periods--and if they perform their duties in accordance with the principles of Ataturk, no action will be taken against them. Those who have committed crimes in the past are an exception. Unfortunately, there are terrorists among them as well. There are those who have supported terrorist centers. Of course action will be taken against them. However, no action will be taken against teachers who belonged to certain organizations and associations as long as they were not involved in crimes and offenses. Since these associations have already been closed down, such an issue is irrelevant. From this aspect, we can all (?believe) that the majority of our teachers are innocent. We were all brought up by them. We kiss their hands whenever we see them. We are grateful for all they have given us. They will remain on duty as long as they deserve their position. If they do not deserve their position, we will not give them the opportunity to poison our innocent children.

[Announcer] A journalist asked how the constituent assembly is to be formed. General Evren said that the necessary announcement will be made to the public when preparations in connection with the constituent assembly are completed. A journalist told Evren: From your statements I got the impression that the ancient regime will not be restored. Am I wrong? In reply, Evren said:

[Evren] Let us not call it an ancient regime, let us not use this term. Let us say that we shall save the country from the extensive tolerance, the nonimplementation of the laws and the indifference which prevailed in the country in previous periods and which brought about the current situation.

[Announcer] In reply to a question by a journalist on when a transition will be made to a democratic system and on the stand adopted by Turkey's neighbors and Iran to the military takeover in Turkey, Head of State, Chief of Staff and National Security Council President General Kenan Evren said:

[Evren] You can well understand that it is impossible to make a program and schedule as though it were a building and as though the date of pouring cement were being decided. Therefore, I said that the transition to a normal system would be made as soon as possible. Speaking of the impression this operation created among our neighbors, I believe both the countries of the world and our neighbors have not shown a great reaction to this operation. I believe that they received this with understanding because this is a domestic issue. We are not going to change our foreign policy because of this domestic issue. Our foreign policy, which was pursued by all past governments, will be continued. As for our friend and neighbor Iran, our relations with Iran have been very good throughout history. As you are well aware, we considered the Iranian revolution to be a domestic issue. We exerted every effort to extend our aid without creating any setbacks in our relations with Iran. I believe that friendly Iran will receive with understanding and maturity this operation aimed at securing and defending the republic.

[Announcer] In reply to a question, National Security Council President General Kenan Evren said that the amendments to the constitution, the election and the political parties laws will be realized after the formation of the constituent assembly. In reply to a foreign journalist who asked about the current and future of relations between Turkey and Greece, Evren said:

[Evren] There have been various breaks [Kopukluk] in our relations with Greece, our very close neighbor, our friend with which we share membership in the same alliance. Turkey has always made approaches with good will--during previous governments as well--to eliminate these breaks. We will also exert every effort, every good will effort in order to improve Turkish-Greek relations and in order to secure the return of Greece to the [military wing of the] NATO alliance. However, we would like to hope that the same good will efforts will also be made by our friend and neighbor Greece.

[Announcer] In reply to a journalist who asked whether or not the United States was informed prior to the operation, National Security Council President General Evren said:

[Evren] Absolutely not. However, I know why you ask this question. Several news agencies, several U.S. news agencies reported--based on information the United States received from the U.S. AID council representatives here--that this operation started in the early hours [of the morning]. Thus, theimpression that we informed them was created. I believe that is why you asked the question. No one knew of this operation except those concerned. So much so that even our spouses and children were not informed. On the evening of 11 September armored units arrived near the building where the U.S. AID council center is situated. They may have suspected. As a matter of fact, they asked why the tanks were in the area. We told them that we are carrying out an exercise, part of the NATO maneuvers which began on 11 September. We told them not to worry and that it was just an exercise. This was the information given. Otherwise, they were not informed of the operation before it was launched.

[Announcer] A foreign television correspondent asked General Evren when there would be a return to democracy. General Evren replied as follows:

[Evren] Your colleagues also asked a while ago when there would be a return to democracy, if I could give a date. We have not eliminated democracy. I would particularly like to point out that we were forced to launch this operation in order to restore democracy with all its principles, to replace a malfunctioning democracy. If they observe our history they will see that the Turkish Armed Forces have always taken steps in order to strengthen democracy. The contrary does not exist. Democracy does not mean that every individual will do as he pleases. This, I hope, is accepted. That was the situation in our country.

[Announcer] A French television correspondent recalled that the Turkish Armed Forces expenditures constitutes one-third of the Turkish budget and asked whether there would be a decrease in this expenditure. The head of state, chief of staff and National Security Council President replied as follows.

[Evren] What he says is correct. It is not one-third, but close to it. It is correct that a large portion of our budget goes to the armed forces. However, if he takes our strategic position into account, he will realize the necessity of keeping such a large army. If the armed forces are modernized and if they are equipped with modern arms and equipment, then of course a stronger army can be achieved with less troops. Without reducing the number of the standing army care will be given to thriftiness within the armed forces as in all other fields. In other words, every effort will be exerted to overcome the current [economic] problem. We will insure that all sectors, all institutions and individuals economize.

VOTCP Criticism

[Untitled station commentary]

[Text] Evren, the head of the junta, spoke to domestic and foreign journalists. He struggled considerably to conceal the truth, deceive the public and justify the overt military coup that terminated bourgeois parliamentarianism. He attempted to use Ataturkism and the principles of Ataturk as a shield for his lies and demagogies.

Throughout his statement, Evren directed the brunt of the attack against the working class, toilers, progressive parties, class unions, democratic organizations, the Kurdish people and anti-American and religious masses. He attacked unionists who acted for democratic rights and freedoms, progressive persons, teachers, the youth, the patriots within the RPP and members of the NSP who have anti-American tendencies. While doing this, he exerted great efforts not to mention fascist murderers, the archmurderer Turkes, Demirel, the reactionary and fascist parties that staged the bloody massacres of Kahramanmaras, Corum, Fatsa and Nigde.

Evren said: This is not a coup. We seized the administration to eliminate the coup on democracy, and this was done without any bloodshed. He was lying. The generals achieved this coup on the blood of thousands of our citizens who were massacred by fascists. The killing of over 5,000 of our citizens mentioned by Evren during his previous speech occurred during the 2-year martial law period. As stressed in the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] appeal [of 12 September 1980], it is known that the shadow government, called the National Security Council, has been sharing power for a long time and that the generals in the junta were authorized to take the measures they wanted through the martial law commands. Moreover, there are also certain pro-fascist martial law commanders among the perpetrators of terrorism--which is incited by the imperialists--who are loyal to this junta.

Evren is saying that they [the military leaders] will now accomplish what previous governments failed to do. Evren is contradicting himself, since he is emphasizing the fact that he will continue to implement the economic program prepared by the government, which the claims has failed. This program has brought the workers and the toiling people nothing but high prices, ruin, unemployment, massacres and bloody terrorism. The architect and executor of this program is the imperialists' and monopolists' special man, Turgut Ozal. Now the junta wants to continue with this old program, and it is making this lord of the monopolies, Ozal, who prepared the program, prime minister. [sentence as heard]

It is evident that this junta, which ends strikes through the use of tanks, panzers and bayonets, closes down labor unions, bans the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions, attempts to continue the exploitation of the working class and arrests unionists, is the enemy of the workers and the toilers and serves the interests of the monopolies. Through his statement during the news conference, that the rights of the employers will be protected, Evren clearly proved that the junta is serving a handful of monopolists.

Evren, the head of the coup, is claiming that the junta will remain loyal to the principle of peace at home and peace in the world. However, the junta that is claiming this has abolished the most basic human rights and freedoms. It started bloody operations against the Kurdish people. The junta banned all kinds of syndical or democratic action. It arrested and imprisoned the progressive and democratic forces and the parliamentarians. It prohibited the participation of the Turkish peace forces in the world peoples parliament to be held in Sofia. The junta has declared war on our people. All this is being done under the banner of peace at home.

The junta also claims to be in favor of peace in the world. It is again lying. Evren states that the junta will remain loyal to NATO, which is an aggressive imperialist organization. The provocative NATO maneuvers, which are currently being conducted on our soil, pose a threat to peace, security and friendship among peoples. Evren states that the junta will further develop its relations with the United States. The United States--chief boss of NATO--is furthering its armament policy and at the same time is implementing a cold war policy. It is deploying new nuclear missiles in Western Europe. The United States is ensuing an adventurist and expansionist policy in our region. Through the bilateral slavery agreements and its aggressive bases on our soil, the United States is dragging our country into the flames of a nuclear war. All these are contrary to the wish of peace in the world.

Evren also claims that a civilian government will be established before the end of the week. Through this statement, the junta hopes to influence our people on the inside and the newly forming protest actions abroad. The coupists, who observe the reaction they are causing in the international field, are trying to justify and legitimize this despotic method through the lies and demogogies that civilians will occupy the government. No excuse can justify or legimitize this junta or the puppet government imposed by it. The junta is scared. It is already seeking ways to absolve itself through so-called civilian administrations, because it is well aware that it will not be able to covercome the deep crises.

Evren lists the issues to be handled after the establishment of the puppet government in the following manner: The constitution, the election law and the political party law will be amended and the shortcomings of the penal code will be eliminated. It is very clear that all these are merely tantamount to the preparation of the legal (?grounds) for a military dictatorship and the elimination of the basic human rights and freedoms for many years under the shadow of the bayonets.

The junta is against our national independence, our sovereignty and our people from all aspects. It is serving the interests of imperialism and the monoplies. The TCP calls on members of the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Socialist Workers Party, the RPP, the NSP, the Kurdish Democrats and the JP-affiliated workers and toilers, whose rights have been seized, to unite against the pro-American and pro-NATO junta.

TERCUMAN CITES VOTCP BROADCASTS URGING MILITANCY

NC170733 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 16 Sep 80 pp 1, 12

[Report by MEDITERRANEAN NEWS AGENCY Correspondent Ali H. Yurtsever in Vienna]

[Text] The Turkish Communist Party radio, which has been interfering with the frequency of the Voice of Turkey radio by broadcasting on that frequency, is constantly calling on its supporters to take militant action against the Turkish military administration. A communique broadcast on Sunday by the "Turkish Communist Party Central Committee" calls not only on its supporters but also on RPP and NSP members as well as members of the Turkish peasants party to participate in joint militancy. It was maintained in the communique that the military intervention Turkey was prepared by the United States. The provovative broadcasts of the Voice of the Turkish Communist Party radio, which render the short wave broadcasts of the Voice of Turkey radio inaudible, have caused sorrow and hatred among our compatriots here in Vienna.

YAMANI, MO'INFAR INTERVIEWED ON OPEC CONFERENCE

AU171021 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1730 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Gert Friedrich report on 16 September OPEC ministers session in Vienna's Hofburg Palace with interviews with Saudi Petroleum Minister Yamani and Iranian Oil Minister Mo'infar; interviews in English with subsequent German translation; recorded portions enclosed in quotes]

[Text] Second day of the OPEC conference in Vienna's Hofburg Palace: This morning the conference split into three sessions held in parallel. The finance ministers of the 13 OPEC states discussed further aid measures vis-a-vis the developing countries in a separate conference room behind the Redouten Hall. The gist of the debate was: Should a special OPEC bank be established, or should the existing fund be enlarged and, should the OPEC member countries set aside some 10 percent of their receipts from oil exports for the developing countries?

Also separated from the plenum, the delegations' experts debated first and foremost the problem of price development and the possibility of indexing oil prices, from the long-term strategy package submitted yesterday.

In the Redouten Hall itself the plenum in substance dealt with the problem of relationships with the industrial countries and with OPEC's position in the North-South dialog. The fact was particularly criticized that three great industrial countries, the United States, Great Britain and the FRG, do not want to participate in the North-South talks within the UN framework.

After the conclusion of today's noon session Saudi Petroleum Minister Shaykh Yamani stated: "There is still a little hope that we will conclude today."

On the question as to whether the discussions were smoother today than yesterday, he added: "Discussions are always marked by different positions. They cannot be termed smooth, but constructive."

Are the positions closer than yesterday? "Concerning the subject that we discussed today? I think it is. "

In the late afternoon joint deliberations began on the proposals worked out in the morning as well as on a draft resolution about OPEC's attitude vis-a-vis the industrial countries. The finance ministers continued their talks. It still is uncertain as to whether the conference will conclude today.

What is certain seems to be a meeting of the oil ministers tomorrow morning. Iranian Oil Minister Mo'infar stated in this context before the beginning of the evening session: "We shall have an oil ministers meeting here to talk about output quantities, because we now have a little surplus on the market. And we must bring this under control. " He replied to the question of whether the most important problem now is to obtain general production guidelines and a general uniform price: "No, the problem of prices will not be discussed tomorrow. But we must think about the oil surplus."

Was a resolution about the relations between OPEC and the industrial nations prepared today? "Naturally the paper is not complete, but I think it will be finished this afternoon." And the main points? "The main topic is the dialog between industrial nations and OPEC and the developed nations about aid and about the transfer of technology and so forth."

Differences Reported

[Mahir 'Uthman report: "OPEC Conference: Gap Narrowed"]

[Excerpts] Vienna--The gap between differing views inside OPEC has narrowed and a search has begun for an agreement formula. This is the gist of the general situation after hours of heated discussions which almost broke up the Vienna conference.

Saudi Petroleum and Minister Affairs Minister Shaykh Ahmad Zaki Yamani described this climate when he said that progress has been made toward reaching a new long-term strategy to restore order in the world oil market. Yamani said: "The distance between us is not far. We are moving."

The foreign, finance and oil ministers of OPEC countries agreed on putting forward an official proposal for a worldwide dialogue within a UN framework between the developing countries--including OPEC countries--on one hand, and the industrialized states, on the other, in order to establish a new world economic order.

It has become almost certain that OPEC countries will increase the amount of aid to the oil-importing developing countries and to provide such aid on a larger scale than hitherto from the Vienna-based organization's $4-billion fund.

It is expected that in return for a price formula that would guarantee for the industrialized countries stable oil supplies and a gradual price increase, OPEC countries will ask the industrialized countries to increase their investments in the less developed countries and to seek to transfer technology to these countries.

In this regard Venezuelan Energy and Mines Minister Humberto Calderon Berti said: "We are agreed on the need for conducting a dialogue between the industrialized and developing countries, and we believe that our problems are the same as those of the rest of the Third World."

The Venezuelan minister added: "Strengthening our relations with the rest of the developing countries would help us in the UN negotiations. We would like to stand with the other Third World countries to negotiate with the industrialized states."

It was learned from conference sources that the ministers agreed that the Algerian-Venezuelan proposal to establish a development bank and give aid to the Third World is not contradictory to the Iraqi proposal to establish a joint fund in which OPEC countries and the OEC will participate. The Venezuelan energy and mines minister said that OPEC wishes to begin immediately giving effective aid to the developing countries without waiting for the industrialized states' participation. Although the figure of $20 billion was previously mentioned as capital for a special fund or development bank to be financed by OPEC to aid Third World countries, there are some doubts about the possibility of obtaining contributions from OPEC countries sufficient to make up this sum.

On Monday night ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT asked Saudi Petroleum and Mineral Affairs Minister Shaykh Ahmad Zaki Yamani whether production levels will be discussed at the ministerial conference in Vienna. He said that production levels anr the present OPEC oil price situation will be discussed at an extraordinary meeting of oil ministers alone in Vienna today (Wednesday).

ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT has learned that Saudi Foreign Minister Sa'ud al-Faysal expressed his belief that, unless agreement is reached in Vienna on a long-term strategy for OPEC countries, no agreement on the question of prices can be reached.

The minister was quoted as saying that Saudi Arabia has so far adhered to the basic price on which OPEC countries agreed at their recent conference in Algiers.

The minister was also quoted as saying that OPEC's long-term strategy also provides for expanding the member states' participation in oil production, refining, distribution and marketing and that it is necessary to pay attention to these matters.

UAE Petroleum and Natural Resources Minister Dr Mani' Sa'id al-'Utaybah said on entering the auditorium on Tuesday night that his country will not reduce the price of its oil because market conditions do not encourage it.

With regard to the production level, Dr al-'Utaybah said: We cannot talk about production levels before the report of the committee on long-term strategy is approved. He warned that unless this report is approved it will be very difficult to reach agreement on the question of production levels and on the present situation of oil prices in the short term at the oil ministers Vienna meeting today (Wednesday).

Conference sources said that Iranian Oil Minister 'Ali Akbar Mo'infar clashed during last night's meeting with Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal over the question of surplus and that Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal accused the Iranian minister of insulting the Saudi people.

Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal said that the ministers' talks yesterday were held in a healthy atmosphere.

NIGERIA WARNS OPEC AGAINST SEPARATE NEGOTIATIONS

AB171930 Lagos International Service in English 1630 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Nigeria has warned the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, OPEC, not to accept separate negotiations with the industrialized nations on the oil market. Instead, the organization should seek general discussions on the state of the international economy.

Addressing the deadlocked meeting of the OPEC ministers in Vienna, Austria, the Nigerian external affairs minister, Prof Ishaya Audu, remarked that it was only energy problems that have been forcing the developed nations into global negotiations. Nigeria, he said, believes that one of the ways of assisting developing countries was to channel profitable investments to such nations. Professor Audu called on OPEC to join forces in the search for a lasting solution to the problems of racism in southern African as well as the Middle East crisis.

SAUDI ARABIA TO RAISE OIL PRICE BY $2 PER BARREL

AU180734 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] The OPEC ministers conference in Vienna was concluded with an absolutely unexpected new price agreement shortly before midnight. Saudi Arabia increases its oil price from $28 to $30 per barrel. With an average daily output of 9.5 million barrels Saudi Arabia accounts for 30 percent of OPEC's entire oil output. The agreement also provides that the other OPEC countries keep unchanged the current crude prices which they have demanded thus far until the forthcoming regular session of the oil ministers on 15 December. Whereas the Venezuelan oil minister spoke of a compromise solution by which a path toward a uniform oil price had been embarked upon, it transpired from the Iranian, Algerian and Libyan delegations that the price agreement is still inadequate to achieve a uniform price system. The three countries also had asked for cuts in Saudi Arabia's oil output.

SCHMIDT, WARREN CHRISTOPHER MEET ON ARMS NEGOTIATIONS

LD171434 Hamburg DPA in German 1353 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 17 Sep (DPA)--Deputy U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher briefed Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn today on Washington's position with regard to the impending dialogue with Moscow on nuclear medium-range missiles. The chancellor and Christopher also discussed in this respect the meeting between U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie and his Soviet counterpart, Andrey Gromyko, which is to take place on 25 September during the UN General Assembly session in New York.

NATO believes that the talks between the United States and the USSR on Eurostrategic weapons should commence 15 October in Geneva. The Federal Government already advocated early this summer that U.S.-Soviet preliminary talks should be started "as quickly as possible."

During their exchange of views on the developments in Turkey since the military coup, Schmidt and Christopher agreed that Bonn and Washington should continue for the moment their aid for this important NATO partner. At the same time, both expressed the hope that democratic conditions will soon return to Turkey. Christopher, who already met Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher at the beginning of the week and discussed the question of medium-range missiles and the Turkish situation, explained Washington's position to the Chancellor at the express request of U.S. President Jimmy Carter.

EMPLOYEES STRIKE GDR RAILWAYS IN W. BERLIN

LD171421 Hamburg DPA in German 1257 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Berlin, 17 Sep (DPA)--The GDR-operated railway in West Berlin is suffering today from the biggest strike since the railway workers' strike in 1949. By midday practically all traffic of goods in the western sector of the city had come to a standstill. The protest actions are connected with the further cuts planned by the GDR in the municipal railway service.

Manfred Houstein, chairman of the [FRG] German state railways working group of the Railway Workers of Germany Trade Union, spoke of "chaotic conditions" in many areas.

Strike Spreads

LD171732 Hamburg DPA in German 1657 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin, (DPA)--Following the strike of goods traffic workers of the GDR operated railway in West Berlin, workers employed in passenger transport on the municipal railway joined the strike this evening. Municipal railway trains came to a standstill at stations at around 1830. Passengers were requested to leave the trains and a driver said that at the moment the strike is unlimited.

Strike Committee To Form

[Summary] Berlin, 18 Sep (DPA)--The railway strike in West Berlin continued today. According to reports by the railway staff, the most important sectors of the rail network are completely paralyzed. This includes goods traffic in the western part of the city, routes into federal territory and into the GDR. There is, however, no interruption to interzonal passenger trains to and from West Berlin. The only services still running are from the Zoo Station to Friedrichsstrasse and the north-south sector from Wannsee to Frohnau via Friedrichsstrasse, though trains are far from regular.

Several stations remained closed this morning, and those that are open carry posters saying that traffic is interrupted. It looks as if a strike committee will form during the day. A mass meeting is due to take place at 1500 in the Berlin-Moabit district. The few railway services still running are manned by railwaymen from East Berlin. The GDR press today has not mentioned the railway strike, though incidents against the railway in West Berlin, such as the throwing of stones, are regularly given prominence as "attacks on GDR territory." NEUES DEUTSCHLAND today has an article about the railway, but it concerns construction building work and the renewal of the line in East Berlin.

Press Reaction

DW180808 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Press review on strike by GDR S-Bahn [Stadtbahn] workers in West Berlin]

[Text] NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG writes: The strike movement in Poland, which created so much insecurity on the part of the SED, has now come even closer to the GDR. Wheels have not suddenly stopped rolling in the second German state, but for the first time the GDR has become directly involved. The Reichsbahn employees who stopped working yesterday in West Berlin are employed by a GDR state enterprise; their strike is directed against the work conditions of that state. This is embarrassing and alarming for East Berlin. But the Reichsbahn workers will certainly not achieve their political aims. What would be granted to those working in West Berlin could not be withheld from those working in East Berlin. A spark could jump to the GDR, similar to the strike in Gdansk. That would call into question the whole system of the centrally managed state trade union.

AUGSBURGER ALLGEMEINE maintains: It is too early to predict that conditions [in the GDR] are similar to those in Poland. After all, the strike is taking place at present only in West Berlin. But the fight of the Reichsbahn workers hits East Berlin in a very sensitive spot. The S-Bahn and Reichsbahn workers are mostly loyal SED comrades who just live in the "capitalist part" of the city, but they transport people and goods, and thus also information from the West to the East. That is exactly what the SED leadership is mostly afraid of.

ECONOMIC 'CRISIS OF SOCIALISM' EXAMINED

[Viktor Meier editorial: "The Crisis of Socialism"]

[Text] A member of the Yugoslav leadership collective, Alexander Grlickov, was asked recently in an interview whether there was a "crisis of socialism." Grlickov denied it: Developments where "world standards" are involved still run in the direction of socialism. If at all, one can speak of the crisis of some forms of the appearance of socialism, particularly of "state socialism," and one can speak of problems and difficulties.

When they speak of "state socialism," the Yugoslavs mean the central planning system prevailing in the Soviet sphere of power, the system which is defined there in a deeply convinced tone as "real" or "actual" socialism. The Yugoslavs juxtapose their "self-management socialism" to that system. Concrete facts indicate, however, that "self-management socialism" is also in a crisis; one can see interesting parallels between Yugoslavia and Poland despite many other differences, not least the helplessness of the top leadership in facing economic phenomena.

One can look in vain at the whole world at present for a well-functioning socialist system. Those developing countries that have been caught in the Marxist trap are trying laborously to free themselves.

In faraway China, also, which originally broke with Moscow for political reasons, people have become skeptical about the economic system. The reforms in socialist states do not "complete" socialism, they water it down. Developments move not toward socialism, but much rather in the direction of many forms oriented toward a market economy.

The model of all current or aimed-for socialist systems was not created in a progressive industrial state, as envisaged by the theoreticians of Marxism, but in backward agrarian Russia. It is characterized by political despotism, a war economy mentality, compulsory work, ruthless exploitation of agriculture and an autarkhic way of thinking. This form and this kind of system may not be strange for the Russian way of life. But after World War II it was extended to completely different peoples in eastern and southeastern Europe. It came up against a central European or Byzantine-Mediterranean mentality in the southern Balkans and became the symbol of foreign rule. With the exception of Yugoslavia, a process of national emancipation that had been developing for almost 200 years was abruptly stopped and thrown back.

The Soviets acted in a completely different way than wise colonizers used to do: They forced an economic system on their new subordinates which condemned them to unproductiveness instead of cranking up their economic activity and profiting from it. They managed to get highly developed Czechoslovakia down to the level of an average Balkan state. Today the Soviets are in a position to force Czechoslovakia to give them practically their entire shoe output at the lowest prices. This country depends on the Soviet Union for scarce crude oil and other raw materials like a baby that still needs its bottle. But there is also another side to this: If Moscow wanted to begin a cure based on abstinence with regard to oil, it would have to renounce the shoes, because Czechoslovakia would no longer be in a position to find replacements for raw materials and energy on the world market.

This economic system which functions so poorly has managed to breed a class of loyal functionaries in Eastern Europe. A socialist system permits the ruling group to exert even more power than in a nonsocialist dictatorship, because every economic activity by the people depends on their mercy or lack thereof. A private sphere to withdraw into is no longer permitted. Indirectly the political interest of this group in the system is being tied to the imperial interests of the Soviet Union, because without foreign support the satraps cannot remain in power for long.

Rebellions against the Soviet-dominated system in Eastern Europe were mostly of a political or national character up to the sixties. Since then, however, the economic element has moved into the foreground, without the others losing significance. The reason lies in the fact that after the "light" sixties and early seventies, when the communist countries were able to tone down Stalinist narrowness through small changes of accents within the system and through ample Western credits, economic difficulties have become a worldwide phenomenon.

Again the inefficiency and incompetence is demonstrated by the individual socialist systems, not least with the worst consequences for communist agricultural policy. The hopes that have been awakened cannot be satisfied. The people in Yugoslavia also have been led to the railroad station, and now they have to be kept from boarding the train. Small Hungary is trying laboriously to act against this with its economic reforms, but there, too, events always catch up with the measures, and the reformers sometimes have the impression they are jousting against a windmill.

BRANDT VIEWS POLISH DEVELOPMENTS, FOREIGN POLICY

DW171025 Bonn DIE WELT in German 16 Sep 80 pp 1,3

[Correspondent Gottfried Capell interview with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt--date, place not given]

[Text] WELT: Mr Brandt, can the political system of Poland with the Communist Party as the leading power at all handle the recent events?

Brandt: It is a most difficult question, namely, the capacity of such a political system for reform. But I do not consider it impossible in the existing framework--which is not merely a domestic but also a foreign political framework--that trade unions can come about which will be qualitatively different from those which were mere transmission belts of the state and the party. Contrary to earlier assumptions, the local political system there has permitted or accepted the establishment of relations with the church and of the church's position that are different than is usual under the rules of the communist system.

WELT: Yet the establishment of independent trade unions calls into question the system as such and the sole leadership role of the party.

Brandt: The representatives of the strikers, particularly in the important Gdansk area, have said in their agreement with deputy government chief Jagielski that they do not want to call into question the role of the Communist Party. They must have had good reason to formulate it like that.

WELT: Would you, like CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor Strauss, recommended to Mr Vetter that the DGB should help the independent Polish trade unions as quickly as possible?

Brandt: After I heard of that suggestion, another message appeared on my desk within the next half hour saying that the Warsaw group which is trying to set up independent trade unions in the capital has strongly requested that others abstain from making foreign financial contributions. These people probably know what they are talking about. I know that many of my trade union friends have not remained inactive in this field. I just say: As soon as the issue of actual or pretended interference comes up, I know addresses which can do that much better than those in the West.

WELT: Do you think that the successes of the strikers were caused by the results of the Helsinki CSCE conference?

Brandt: Many people say that. I am a bit more reserved. At any rate, the things one connects with Helsinki presuppose normalization of our relations with Poland and other states of the Warsaw Pact; Helsinki has created the framework conditions. The chimera of German revanchism does not belong to them any more, which may have been the case 15 years ago. The process of normalizing relations, of orderly cooperation, obviously seems to make it easier also for states with a completely different system than ours to discuss reforms, easier than it was before. In this there exists a certain connection, an indirect rather than direct connection.

WELT: Great hopes had evolved at least in 1968 in connection with developments in Czechoslovakia. Some Social Democrats said something to the effect that the beginning of a new policy toward the East facilitated the Prague spring. Then came the brutal invasion. Do you think that the danger of a similar disappointment is waiting for us?

Brandt: I do not remember now the statements that were made at the time. But if they indicate what you have said, they have not been disproved: The subject was another partner than the one who marched in. As regards the former attitudes on the process in Czechoslovakia, there is no need to quote only Social Democratic sources. The then Federal Chancellor Kiesinger's statements were in full accord with our opinion. Historically seen, one will realize some time that (in contrast to what is going on in Poland) the efforts of a communist leadership group to achieve reforms have not been disproved by a temporary disruption through brutal force.

WELT: If the strikers and their leaders in Poland do not call in question the role of the Communist Party, what will then be possible with regard to pluralism?

Brandt: Due to the strong role played by the Catholic Church, there is some pluralism in Poland, The role played by the church has not become weaker. The fact that intellectual life has developed in Poland in the past years actually contradicts the monolithic character of a communist one-party state.

Moreover, I would like to ask the experts, who have more time these weeks than I do, to look it up in Lenin's works. If I remember correctly, Lenin voiced great doubts in a 1923 text, which is not published in communist-ruled states for understandable reasons, doubts with regard to the development of trade unions that become mere tools of a ruling party. I would not be surprised if there were some people in Poland who know these texts.

WELT: Can developments in Poland become significant for the Madrid CSCE followup conference?

Brandt: Preparations for Madrid are underway. It is quite understandable for me that there are people saying: If something developed in or around Poland that amounted to a challenge, not merely with regard to many Poles but also with regard to many people outside Poland, it could become a very heavy burden.

WELT: Only then?

Brandt: Why should I anticipate what others fear? I assume that the conference will begin in November. I assume that it will be disrupted before Christmas, which makes sense. The American elections regardless of their outcome fall in that period of time. Ours will be just over, although I have no doubts with regard to their result. But two important states will then be involved in government reshuffles. I believe therefore that the actual conference will get going in January. Then one will be able to see things more clearly than today. If I had to speak in Madrid about the significance of developments in Poland, I would say that wherever the problem of trade unions is involved, their representatives must be able to state their opinions and formulate their demands. That is not too far from what is contained in the much-quoted third basket of the Helsinki Final Act.

WELT: What role will be played by the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan? The final document commits the Soviet Union and all other signatory states to applying the principles also to such states which have not signed the agreement.

Brandt: Yes, that is indeed something of which all involved ought to be reminded, and in this case particularly one of those involved. But the 10 commandments are much older than the final document of Helsinki, and mankind comes only close to fulfilling the demands contained therein.

WELT: What can the followup conference bring if Afghanistan teaches us, for example, that detente is divisible after all? Federal Foreign Minister Genscher has just stressed the principle of detente's indivisibility to his Hungarian colleague. Do you agree?

Brandt: I do not feel like participating in sophisticated speculations, I consider facts. It is a fact that there was not peace in the world when we made our treaties--they are no less important than the things that led to Helsinki later on. It all belongs together at least--and when the Western powers made the Berlin agreement with the Soviet Union, which we welcomed, there was war in Vietnam, and both world powers were involved--one of them with troops, the other with arms.

We did not say in our treaties: first everything must be settled in the world, and then we will make the treaties. We made the treaties, we have said that we will do everything to mitigate the dangers of war in our part of the world. I have always hoped that improved relations in Europe could bring influence to bear on other parts of the world with regard to the indivisibility of detente. Indivisibility of detente is not a state one can preserve, because it is something that does not exist.

WELT: But Afghanistan does not give any hopes for making the patented article [markenartikel] detente exportable in and beyond Europe.

Brandt: I do not know whether it is a patented article. This term has become customary for efforts to improve relations between the European states. Those who have got these efforts going at least with regard to Germany, know that these efforts are extremely endangered.

I want to put it as follows: Regardless how happy I am that a number of practical regulations exist between the West and the East in Europe, including both states on German territory together with many more possibilities for political action, I still know that political detente alone cannot prevail.

If, for example, political detente in the eighties is not complemented by first moderate but real steps toward arms limitation, detente will indeed not survive.

WELT: Arrests have been made in the CSSR. The Soviet media carry strong attacks vis-a-vis alleged Western interference in Poland. Similar things can be heard from the GDR. Shouldn't one fear--also with regard to the CSCE process--that the Soviet Union will bridle the CSSR and the GDR because of Poland, for example, in order to better hold together their own imperium?

Brandt: I cannot rule that out. I just say that what has taken place in Poland could also be observed in a somewhat different way in Hungary in past years, namely, that the interests of the people could be better adhered to under such systems than before. It brings us back to the fact that developments are possible even in such systems. The Hungarian economy has become more flexible, German economic experts who have contacts with Hungary say this. The supply situation has improved, and visitors to Budapest tell me that the climate there is pleasant.

WELT: Let me ask you again: What can one hope to come from the CSCE followup meeting?

Brandt: As a European one must always realize that it naturally depends to a great extent not merely on the fine texts which are being prepared by our efficient officials and by those of other countries. How relations will be on 11 November when the meeting opens will most of all depend on relations between the leading powers of the two alliance systems. The U.S. Secretary of State and the USSR foreign minister will have met by then. Others will also have had talks by then. When great things are involved, framework conditions depend very much on relations between the two world powers.

SCHMIDT VIEWS PARTICIPATION IN NATO MANEUVERS

[Reporter Udo Philipp interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt; place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Not all alliance partners are taking part with the same degree of involvement. The maneuvers demonstrate that we have some sort of graduated defense presence in the alliance. The Belgians are not there, I do not even want to mention Turkey. Are you somewhat worried by this?

[Answer] Well, I cannot accept the term graduated presence. The Belgians have acute financial problems, they will overcome them. As regards Turkey, one cannot at all speak of a minor presence. It is a corps maneuver which I am visiting here--American and German troops have exercises together. But it is still early in the day and I would like to see somewhat more of it.

OPINION POLL ON ELECTION OUTCOME, VOTE SPLITTING

DW171125 [Editorial Report] Hamburg ARD Television Network in German at 1900 GMT on 16 November 1980 carries the last "Monitor Polito-Gramm" prior to the Bundestag elections on the basis of an Infas opinion poll. Moderator Hoffmann says that the average voter's sympathy for Schmidt or Strauss has not changed much in the past months. The sympathy curve shows that 61 percent of the voters are for Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, while 25 percent are for Franz Josef Strauss, the Bavarian minister-president, CSU chairman and CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor.

Young voters, however, have a different opinion. Some 73 percent of them are for Schmidt, while only 13 percent are for Strauss.

As regards the election system in the FRG with first and second round votes, some 45 percent of those questioned believe that the first and the second vote are of equal importance; some 26 percent believe that the first vote is more important; 9 percent do not know the difference; while 20 percent believe that the second vote is more important.

Moderator Hoffmann thus concludes that more than 50 percent of the voters do not know about the importance of their votes. Some 65 percent of the voters want to give both their votes to one party, some 11 percent say that they will "most likely" vote for two different parties, some 6 percent say that they will "perhaps" vote for two different parties, while 18 percent did not say anything.

The moderator goes on to say that the big parties are particularly worried by the splitting of votes, stressing that "according to our findings, the SPD has twice as much reason to feel worried as the CDU."

"Of the 11 percent planning to split their votes, some 46 percent of SPD followers want to give their second vote to the FDP, and 11 percent to the CDU. Of the CDU/CSU followers 24 percent will give their second vote to the FDP and 6 percent to the SPD," says Hoffmann, adding that the FDP traditionally profits from the splitting system.

As regards the electorate's intentions some 3 weeks prior to the Bundestag elections, the situation remained rather stable compared with previous months:

SPD	43 percent
CDU/CSU	44.5 percent
FDP	9 percent

All others, including the Greens, not more than 3.5 percent.

Hoffmann concludes by saying that a competitive opinion poll institute has published some other figures than Infas today, showing that the SPD was ahead of the CDU and that FDP was not as strong as Infas believes.

GISCARD D'ESTAING OUTLINES AIMS OF 1981 BUDGET

LD171525 Paris LE MONDE in French 12 Sep 80 p 31

[Text] The cabinet meeting chaired by Valery Giscard d'Estaing on Wednesday, 10 September, devoted most of its time to the 1981 finance bill. After the budget minister's report the president of the republic stated:

"All budgets express an intention. The 1981 draft budget, which has been carefully prepared and calculated, has two objectives: to support the country's productive activity and to ensure a strong currency.

"Support for productive activity is being sought by reducing tax pressures, notably with regard to sectors whose taxes have been stabilized, and by the creation of considerable credit for capital improvements.

"In order to assert this intention, I asked the government to set a growth target higher than the one which resulted from spontaneous calculations.

"The value of our currency will be maintained by rejecting the expedient policy of accepting an increase in the deficit and by striving to reduce administrative spending. In this respect it should be noted that France's public finances are in an exemplary state compared with those of all other industrial countries.

"An important innovation is being made in family policy: granting an additional half-share of income tax allowance in 1981 for all families with at least three children.

"The 1981 draft budget therefore reflects the threefold intention to support productive activity, to ensure the franc's stability and to reduce the tax paid by families with three or more children."

Presidential spokesman Jean-Marie Poirier stated after the cabinet meeting that the draft budget had been drawn up on the basis of a 1.6-percent annual growth but that the government's objective is to achieve more than 2-percent growth.

FRENCH, SWISS MINISTERS DISCUSS WORLD BILATERAL ISSUES

LD171213 Paris LE MONDE in French 7-8 Sep 80 p 5

[Jean-Claude Buhrer dispatch: "Jean Francois-Poncet Assesses Franco-Swiss Relations"]

[Text] Berne--Jean Francois-Poncet returned to France early on 6 September after a short official visit to Berne. The French foreign minister arrived in Berne on Friday afternoon and was first received by Swiss President Georges-Andre Chevallaz and then began talks with Swiss chief of diplomacy Pierre Aubert. The discussions between the two ministers continued during a working dinner at Lohn Castle near Berne.

Following Mr Aubert's visit to Paris in 1979 this meeting falls within the framework of the annual meetings between the two countries' foreign ministers. This desire to maintain more regular contacts was expressed during Mr Sauvagnargues' [former French foreign minister] visit to Switzerland in 1976. Since then a dialogue has been established which Mr Francois-Poncet described as "constructive and very important."

In the absence of any real bones of contention Mr Francois-Poncet and Mr Aubert devoted most of their meeting to surveying the main international political problems. The affair of the two French customs officers recently arrested in Switzerland was mentioned but, as Mr Francois-Poncet indicated, this incident has been "put into proportion" and shelved.

With only a few days to go before the preparatory meeting for the Madrid CSCE conference the two ministers noted the deterioration in the international climate and the threats to East-West relations since the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. As on most other questions, the two countries have fairly close positions on the Madrid conference, although Switzerland would like to approach disarmament as a whole while France would like to draw a clear distinction between conventional and nuclear weapons. In addition, despite the skepticism which persists at the New York conference, France and Switzerland say that they are both dtermined to make progress in "this long task" of North-South dialogue.

Finally, Mr Francois-Poncet explained the EC position on the Middle East to his Swiss counterpart. For his part Mr Aubert was able to give his interlocutor information on Iran and the hostage question, since the Swiss Confederation is representing U.S. interests in Tehran.

The Confederation is also still an important economic partner for France. More than 50,000 French people (in other words the second largest French community abroad) live in Switzerland. On the bilateral level Mr Francois-Poncet asked Mr Aubert to examine in particular the possibility of allowing French citizens in Switzerland to vote at the consulates in order to take part in their country's elections. At present Swiss legislation forbids foreigners to vote on Swiss soil. Mr Aubert gave an assurance that Switzerland is studying the problem.

Finally, Mr Francois-Poncet stressed the question of customs duties; this could lead to the start of preliminary negotiations on revising the agreement currently in force.

DACKO TO MAKE 'PRIVATE' VISIT 21-24 SEP

AB171244 Paris AFP in French 1107 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 17 Sep (AFP)--The president of the Central African Republic, Mr David Dacko, will pay a private visit to Paris from 21-24 September, it was learned from the Central African Republic Embassy in Paris on Wednesday.

Mr Dacko, who overthrew Emperor Bokassa with the help of French parachutists on 20 September, might be received by President Giscard d'Estaing, African sources said.

This visit, after that of the Zairian President Mobutu Sese Seko last week, and before that of the Gabonese President Omar Bongo from 30 September to 4 October, could be an occasion for talks between the two heads of state on the initiative envisaged by central African countries to resolve the Chadian problem, as announced by President Mobutu when he came out of the Elysee last Friday.

It will also enable them to take stock of both the political and the economic situation in the new Central African Republic Government's first year in office which has been marked by the removal of the vice president, Henri Maidou, and the prime minister, Bernard Christian Ayandho, now under protective custody of the Central African Army.

COMMUNISTS PROTEST ARREST OF CHARTER 77 SIGNATORIES

LD171559 Paris LE MATIN in French 13-14 Sep 80 p 10

[Text] The Committee for the Defense of Freedoms in Czechoslovakia, in which several French Communist activists are prominent, protested yesterday against the arrest last Tuesday of 11 signatories to the Czechoslovak Charter 77. "Events in Poland are bound to have repercussions" in Czechoslovakia where, they add, "fundamental rights of the workers, namely, the right to strike and the right to set up independent trade unions, do not exist." They also recall the case of Otka Bednarova, a former spokeswoman for the Charter, who is now in jail and whose health gives cause for concern.

WESTERN NATIONS SUPPORT CSCE AGENDA PROPOSALS

LD171434 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Summary] At this morning's session of the CSCE preparatory meeting the Spanish delegation submitted a formal proposal to form the basis of the agenda for the main meeting. It is essentially the one that was verbally submitted last Monday, when it was given a favorable reception by the majority of the countries of the Western bloc, but not by the countries of the East.

The Spanish proposal reiterates the points of the so-called yellow book which was the principal working document at the conference held in Belgrade. The Spanish proposal covers nine points, among them, that the official opening next November be in the form of a speech by the representative of the host country, followed by one from the secretary general of the United Nations or his representative. There should also be contributions from the UN Economic Commission for Europe, UNESCO, and representatives of nonparticipating Mediterranean states.

Soviet 'Resistance'

LD172302 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] The proposal which Spain made today for the agenda of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to be held in Madrid in November found support among the Western countries and encountered resistance from the Soviet delegation. The Spanish initiative is only (?intended) to be a working basis for the other delegations taking part in this preparatory meeting of the conference, explained the leader of the Spanish delegation, Javier Ruperez. [words indistinct] is not a question of a binding proposal, but a basis upon which to continue the work of the conference and that Spain is ready to act with the utmost flexibility to accept the ideas of the other countries taking part.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON NEW CABINET AFTER RESHUFFLE

LD161539 [Editorial Report] Spanish newspapers published on 9 September carry editorials commenting on the recent Spanish cabinet reshuffle, generally expressing guarded approval of the changes effected.

Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA maintains on page 5 that Prime Minister Suarez appears to have "sought to form a cabinet with greater capacity for endurance and stability, sparing no efforts to bring into this team the most important names of the political force which he heads." It adds: "Without exaggeration, we can say that this government will demonstrate what the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] is capable of doing in the administration of power or no other government will be able to do." It also asserts that it is "the most leftwing government which could be formed within the range represented by the UCD's spectrum," and that this suggests that "the cabinet's composition is due to a guiding idea of preferring to agree with the forces located to the left of the ruling party."

Madrid EL PAIS asserts on page 8 that "Prime Minister Suarez has gone back the way he has come--downhill--since April 1979 to return to the point where he was immediately before last year's general elections in March," adding: "This government is a government which was previously known but it is also a better government or one that is not as bad as the former government. The return of Francisco Fernandez Ordonez, Rodolfo Martin Villa and Pio Cabanillas--three men of indisputable influence within the UCD--represents recognition of the UCD's 'families.'"

Madrid ABC stresses on page 2 the unpopularity which the government will have to accept in resolving the various economic problems, and notes: "However, it seems certain that this cabinet reshuffle alone will not be sufficient for resolving such grave problems. With respect to parliament, the new government needs a broader and more secure base."

NORWAY

NORDLI WRITES ON NATO CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING DEBATE

LD171507 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 1[illegible] Sep 80 p 5

[Prime Minister Odvar Nordli article in "Saturday Guest" column: "The Contingency Stockpiling Debate"]

[Text] In the last few weeks we have had a relatively lively debate on the question of the contingency stockpiling of allied military equipment in Norway. The question was discussed at the Labor Party's National Executive meeting last weekend. In a unanimous resolution the National Executive declared its agreement with the government's treatment of the question so far. At the same time as it was determined that the National Executive will discuss the matter again when it has been cleared up further, that is, after negotiations on a number of practical and economic questions involved have been completed.

The government expects that such negotiations could be started in a month. These would primarily be bilateral negotiations and studies between the United States and Norway, but there will also be discussions within NATO, because part of the finance will have to come from NATO's infrastructure budget.

The government has never been opposed to comprehensive discussion of our security policy. On the contrary the government has initiated it, through its treatment of the 1974 defense budget commission's proposals. The fact that the public debate has concentrated chiefly on how big the defense budgets' growth framework is to be, can hardly be blamed on the government. The public documents that the government has produced have contained a great deal of material that could provide the impetus for the debate that many now claim we have had.

Both according to our constitution and traditional practice the government carries a special responsibility for the nation's foreign and security policy. This is so because a nation must have a foreign and security policy that is credible and uniform. This is a reality which a responsible governing party must take into account. We cannot have several security policy approaches simultaneously; then our credibility in the eyes of the outside world would be shaken.

The question of the contingency stockpiling of equipment for the allied help we will need if we are attacked is in reality a question of whether the policy we have followed since the 1950's will remain credible in the future. The storing of such equipment will not change the consistent base and nuclear policies we have always followed. On the contrary, contingency stockpiling will lend credibility to this line, at the same time as it would be possible for us to maintain low tension as far as possible if a crisis should threaten our territory. Without such contingency stockpiling I am afraid that we would have to take another look at our own defence forces. This could present us with much more painful choices than the situation we are now facing.

Parts of the debate which we have just witnessed are really about the crucial question of Norwegian membership of NATO. I say expressly parts of the debate, not all of it. It is completely logical that those who have always been opposed to Norwegian NATO membership are also opposed to our attempts to make certain of help from other NATO countries in a given situation. It is precisely this that is the very nucleus of our NATO membership. One is quite justified in asking what we are doing in NATO, if we are not going to put ourselves in a position where we are able to receive help from our allies.

In this connection there is every reason to point out that it is the Norwegian Government alone that decides when allied help should be called for. This is not decided in either Brussels, Moscow or Washington, but in Oslo. It is Norwegian interests that will be protected and it is only the Norwegian Government which can attend to them. I hope that the continued debate on these vital questions can be carried on at a relatively sober level. We must take account of the realities which surround us; at least the government has to. We cannot allow ourselves to be driven by fear or pressure from any source, but must make our decisions after proper discussions and on the basis of hard facts--this will be the government line in the future.

SWEDEN

REACTION TO YURIY BREZHNEV ARTICLE ON TRADE

LD161539 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 11 Sep 80 p 6

[Olle Rossander report: "DAGENS NYHETER Russian Article a Surprise in Negotiations"]

[Text] Many eyebrows were raised Wednesday in industrial firms, organizations and government offices when it was possible to read in a "Debate Article" in DAGENS NYHETER written by Soviet First Deputy Foreign Trade Minister Yuriy Brezhnev what had hitherto been seen as a secret agenda from the Soviet Union for the coming discussions on continued trade relations with Sweden. [For text of the Yuriy Brezhnev article published by Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish on 10 September, see the Western Europe section of the 16 September Soviet Union DAILY REPORT.]

It has been impossible to gain any explanation of the almost unique Soviet move of publishing in advance its negotiation targets, and comments have been characterized by their great caution but also by happy surprise. One of the reasons, perhaps the only one, behind publication must be to really increase trade with Sweden, think several of those with whom DAGENS NYHETER has talked. The important mixed commission, which will travel to the Soviet Union at the end of the month for a new round of talks, has had cause to wonder if the change in the post of head of the Soviet delegation may mean something more substantial than the fact that the general public is now also able to read the otherwise secret documents.

This fall's negotiations will be Yuriy Brezhnev's first, and the article could, in the opinion of several of those with whom DAGENS NYHETER has spoken, mean a change in attitude--that it may be a little easier to boost trade between the countries. Up to now the obstacle has been the fact that what Sweden most of all wants to buy--raw materials, not least oil--the Soviet Union would rather not sell. What the Soviet Union is most willing to sell--advanced machines and technology, for example--is not in very great demand in Sweden.

The passage in Brezhnev's article on increased coastal trade makes several of those with whom DAGENS NYHETER has spoken hope that the Russians are willing to allow less centralized trade between the countries, as is the case with Finland, perhaps within the framework of the organization built up for Finnish-Soviet coastal trade, Lenfintorg. This would give even small firms the chance to trade directly with the Baltic states, for example.

The reason trade must be determined at government level in the case of the Soviet Union is partly due to the fact that the two currencies cannot be exchanged for one another, and partly to the fundamental idea of the Soviet Union's planned economy. All East-West trade is thus an advanced form of barter, where Sweden, for example, agrees to buy a certain number of cars, machines or electronic equipment in order to be able to buy the oil and gas we really want at the same time. The Soviet Union is "paid" in Swedish goods, such as grain, hotel installations or flight-control equipment, for example.

HURD MEETS WITH NABULUS MAYOR, PLO REPRESENTATIVE

LD180653 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 17 Sep 80 pp 1-2

[Text] Arab diplomatic circles have expressed their satisfaction with the results of the meeting yesterday between Douglas Hurd, British minister of state at the Foreign Office, and Bassam ash-Shak'ah, mayor of Nabulus, in the presence of the PLO representative in London, Nabil ar-Ramlawi.

These circles linked the meeting, which was the first of its kind, to the encouraging development of Britain's official attitude, which became clear at the EEC ministerial conference in Brussels, toward recognition of the Palestinian people's rights.

Hurd, accompanied by Oliver Miles, head of the Near East and North Africa Department at the British Foreign Office, called on Ash-Shak'ah at his hotel in central London. The meeting, which lasted about an hour, was attended by Mr Ar-Ramlawi.

After the British minister inquired about Ash-Shak'ah's health and the progress of his treatment, the mayor of Nabulus explained to the minister the conditions which the Palestinian Arab people are suffering under occupation and the Israeli authorities' actions in the occupied Arab territories, such as the seizure of lands, the plundering of water resources and the settlement policy. He also explained the difficulties of the municipal councils and cultural institutions in occupied Palestine are facing because of the arbitrary measures taken by the occupation authorities, and he talked about the inhuman treatment of Arab detainees.

Ash-Shak'ah explained the dangers of the Israeli policy on both the local and international levels and asserted that the inhabitants of the occupied territories are rallying around the PLO and its leadership as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestine people authorized to speak on behalf of the Palestinians.

During the meeting Ash-Shak'ah expressed his views regarding what is known as the Middle East crisis and pointed to the futility of the "Camp David" method which he described as a conspiracy to liquidate the Palestinian problem. He also pointed to the shortcomings of Resolution 242 which ignores the Palestinian people's national rights, saying that it does not envisage enabling the Palestinian people to exercise their natural right to self-determination like every other nation and, therefore, will fail to bring peace to the area.

When the British minister asked for Ash-Shak'ah's opinion about the "practical solution" required he said that two principal elements are needed to achieve a solution: total Israeli withdrawal from the occupied Arab territories and recognition of the Palestinian people's right to establish a state of the their own.

Replying to the minister's remarks regarding what he described as a "stiffening" of the Palestinian stand in respect of the resolutions adopted by the recent Fatah movement conference, Ar-Ramlawi replied that reports on the Palestinian attitude in this regard were inaccurate. He said that, while the Palestinian leadership has taken important steps toward the establishment of a just and comprehensive peace in the area, the Israeli Government has acted as a stumbling block to such a solution and has been defying all international procedures and UN resolutions. Ar-Ramlawi reminded the British minister of PLO Chairman Yasir 'Arafat's recent statements.

In reply to a question by ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT at the end of the meeting the British minister avoided commenting on the political nature of the visit, saying only that "I have come to visit Mr ash-Shak'ah and to be reassured about his health." Meanwhile Ar-Ramlawi and Ash-Shak'ah expressed their satisfaction with the visit, which enabled the holding of the first public meeting between a minister in the British Government and a PLO representative in Britain.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES TALKS; TRAVELS TO ISLAMIC CONFERENCE

TA171445 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas left the island this morning to attend the extraordinary meeting of the Islamic foreign ministers on the subject of Jerusalem to begin in Morocco tomorrow.

In a statement before his departure, Denktas said that he is going to Morocco as the special guest of the king of Morocco and the Islamic Conference Secretariat on behalf of the Turkish Cypriot people.

Pointing out that Israel's declaration that Jerusalem--which is a sacred city for the Islamic world--is its capital constitutes a great incitement and attack against the Islamic world, Denktas said: Jerusalem will be saved from this invasion and the Islamic world will be saved from this injustice. The will of God, the manifestation of justice and the unity of the Islamic world necessitate this. Peace in the Middle East cannot be secured unless God and justice rule in Jerusalem and our Palestinian brothers return to their homes. If the superpowers want peace in the world, they should insure that the Palestinian people attain their land and country.

In reply to a question of the Greek Cypriot proposals submitted to the Turkish Cypriot side during yesterday's session of the intercommunal talks on the subject of Maras [Varosha], Denktas said that these proposals are not any different from previous proposals. Noting that the subject is being studied and that the Turkish Cypriot view on this matter will be submitted to the Greek Cypriot side after 1 month, Denktas said: Their attitude is not conciliatory. A reply will be given to them in a conciliatory approach.

On the subject of the protest staged by certain organizations like EDEK and Agon in the Greek Cypriot sector against the military takeover in Turkey, Denktas said that these protests are aimed at attacking Turkey and noted: Under the guise of progressive organizations and democratic forces, these people appear to support those who assist in the destruction of Turkey because they wish to see Turkey destroyed and not because they wish to protect those who have been shedding the blood of their brothers for years.

A journalist recalled that the statement by Turkish head of state, chief of staff and National Security Council President Gen Kenan Evren that Cyprus is an indivisible part of Turkey confused the Greek Cypriot side. The journalist remarked that there are reports that Greece will request clarifications from Turkey on this issue and asked Denktas' view on this subject.

Denktas replied: Cyprus occupies a very important material and moral place in the Turkish world. Turkey cannot abandon Cyprus to Greece. The issue starts here. Denktas recalled that the Turkish Cypriot community, which is an indivisible and undetachable part of the Turkish nation, was for years oppressed, murdered, deprived of its human rights and subjected to varied inhuman treatment with the aim of annihilation and that Anatolia had to cry for Cyprus for many years. He noted that all these incidents increase the value and importance of Cyprus for Turkey. Denktas said: General Evren has stated a historic truth and has noted that the establishment of a bicommunal federal republic between the communities in Cyprus is the solution envisaged by Turkey. In the same way, Turkey had envisaged the establishment of a partnership republic between the two communities in 1959 and had guaranteed the existence of this republic. Finally, Turkey has proved that it is in favor of Cyprus remaining as an independent country based on two communities by protecting Cyprus' independence and the republic through the sacrifice of even its children in order to prevent the destruction and massacre of this republic [words indistinct].

Pointing out that in view of these realities, it is normal that the noisy Greek Cypriot press made an outcry, Denktas said: They seek material for their propaganda in every subject and find it. However, I do not want to think that the Greek Government would go as far as to request clarifications from Ankara on this subject for such a statement. If such a request has been submitted, it will probably receive an answer.

Comments in Istanbul

TA172040 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas has said that the Turkish side will continue to defend its cause at the negotiating table with good will and within the framework of the realities. Denktas stopped over today in Istanbul on his way to Fes, Morocco to participate in the Islamic countries' foreign ministers meeting to be held there tomorrow. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport, Denktas told a TRT correspondent that the Greek Cypriot side has once more resorted to propaganda at the intercommunal talks which resumed in Cyprus yesterday. Denktas claimed that the Greek Cypriots violated the principle of secrecy in the talks.

DENKTAS AGAIN CRITICIZES GREEK CYPRIOTSUN REPRESENTATION

TA171254 (Cladestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] President Denktas has reiterated the fact that attempts by the Greek Cypriot administration to represent Cyprus as a whole at international forums were ipso jure null and void. In a letter to the UN secretary general, Mr Waldheim, President Denktas said that it had come to knowledge that the Greek Cypriot administration intended to send a delegation to the United Nations composed of wholly Greek Cypriots to masquerade as the representative of the whole of Cyprus. He said that he felt compelled, in order to forestall any possible future misunderstanding, to reiterate the immutable fact that the 1960 constitution of Cyprus contained the express provisions about the participation of the Turkish and Greek Cypriot wings of the republic in the administration of the state in all its organs. He added: Consequently, it is legally impossible for either wing to represent the whole of the state without the consent of the other.

President Denktas said that, in view of these facts, the Greek Cypriot administration could not represent the whole of Cyprus, and any undertaking by a delegation of that administration would not be binding on the Turkish people of Cyprus.

MITSOTAKIS, U.S. ENVOY DISCUSS 'DIALOGUE' ON BASES

AT161245 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Excerpts] The government agreed on a dialogue with Washington--even though in the form of "preliminary negotiations"--for the signing of a new Greek-U.S. defense agreement on the bases. The negotiation date will be scheduled later.

U.S. Ambassador in Athens McCloskey yesterday visited Foreign Minister Mitsotakis to whom he presented the draft of the new agreement, as previously prepared after a series of contacts "at the technical level" both in Athens and in Washington.

According to existing information the new plan is based upon:

Both the Greek-U.S. agreement initialled--but not signed--in July 1977; as well as the U.S.-Turkish defense agreement of March 1980.

U.S. sources gave assurances yesterday that they agree that the Greek side should schedule the relevant date for commencement of negotiations and that the draft agreement is aimed at giving Greece "similar treatment to that being given to Turkey."

During the meeting McCloskey informed Mitsotakis that the U.S. administration has received assurances from the Turkish military leaders that the problem with Greece will be dealt with in a "positive" way, letting it be understood that this position has to do not only with bipartite relations but also with the question of Greece's return to NATO.

In reference to this last point it was stated yesterday that McCloskey did not discuss the question of reintegration--in accordance to the most popular view at the U.S. Embassy here--considering that this question comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of General Rogers and not of the U.S. administration.

It must, however, not be expected that negotiations on the base issue (even at their preliminary stage) will commence prior to the New York meeting between the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers scheduled for 26 September.

During the Mitsotakis-McCloskey meeting there was also a broad review of progress in Greek-U.S. economic relations and it was agreed that delegations from the two countries will meet in Athens on 2 October to discuss implementation of the economic and technical cooperation agreement signed early this year.

Our Bonn correspondent, V.P. Mathiopoulos, reported that during yesterday's meeting between West German Foreign Minister Genscher and Deputy Secretary of State Christopher there was a discussion of the speedy return of Greece to NATO's military wing, within the framework of Turkish developments. In Bonn they continue to believe that changes in Turkey will in the end "facilitate" Greek reintegration with NATO.

This climate is also reflected within Turkey itself, where the press reports that the Western countries expect both a solution of the problem of Greece's return as well as specific results from the intercommunal talks in Cyprus.

TERCUMAN particularly notes that "Turkey will benefit from a solution of these problems" and that "previous governments lost all ability to maneuver on these issues due to their concern over domestic policy. Today, however, such problems do not exist."

Yesterday's meeting between President of the Republic Karamanlis and Prime Minister Rallis was also related to these problems. As announced, Rallis "briefed him [Karmanlis] on the country's general situation."

KKE-Interior Condemnation

AT161210 Athens I AVYI in Greek 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Excerpt] The press bureau of the KKE-Interior issued the following statement on yesterday's Mitsotakis-McCloskey meeting:

"Today's (yesterday's) Mitsotakis-McCloskey meeting demonstrates Washington's haste, particularly after the Turkish military coup, in signing the agreement on bases and returning our country to military NATO. More generally it underlines the desire of the United States to make sure of the Greek territory within its aggressive plans in our broader area, plans which it has been recently speeding up with insistence.

"As can be seen through the Mitsotakis statement, the Greek Government also demonstrates the same haste thus disregarding the dangers which arise for our country from such a course.

"Once again the KKE-Interior expresses its full opposition--which is far stronger these days--to reintegration within the military wing of NATO and to a renewal of the agreement on U.S. bases which must be removed from our country as soon as possible.

"The Turkish coup is an additional reason for freeing our country from this dangerous enclavement which the United States and the military leadership of the Atlantic alliance are climaxing."

FLORAKIS PROPOSES POPULAR FRONT, CRITICIZES PASOK

AT151305 AThens I VRADHINI in Greek 15 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Last night the KKE openly proposed a popular front for the purpose of removing the rightwing from the country and for the purpose of establishing "a democratic government which will undertake to implement that other policy which the people demand today, the policy which opens the way for further changes and for social progress."

The proposal was made in an address by the KKE-Exterior Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis during the Communist Youth Festival in which he also revealed that the immediate political goal of his party is to concentrate such a percentage of votes during the 1981 election that will allow it to participate in the second distribution of chamber seats together with New Democracy and PASOK. He said such an eventuality would change the reinforced proportional system into a simple proportional system of representation and would take parliamentary majority away from the right.

In his speech Florakis also attacked PASOK because it undermines election cooperation and because of its "paternalistic" policy. He also warned PASOK that a self-supporting government cannot implement change all by itself but that a democratic government can, supported by a strong unified mass peoples movement.

In his speech Florakis lauded Russian foreign policy, attacked the United States and President Carter, insisted on final withdrawal from NATO and on the closing of U.S. bases and criticized the government's domestic and economic policies and other issues.

PASOK protects

"PASOK Does Not Need Guardians," is the headline published by PASOK's weekly newspaper which severely criticized both the KKE-Interior as well as the KKE-Exterior after statements and comments by their leading personalities which were directed against PASOK and specifically their attempts to present PASOK as unable to take over authority and to implement change. The comment then described such efforts as purely undermining efforts.

RIZOSPASTIS COMMENTS ON TURKISH COUP, RETURN TO NATO

[Text] The relief and optimism which the Turkish junta offered to the NATO leadership directly influenced the Greek leaders' psychology. The dark thoughts and ominous forecasts that had clouded the sky of New Democracy were immediately swept aside. Uncertainty, unpleasantness and skepticism were suddenly dissipated and the smile of "hope" reappeared on the lips of ministers, cadres, and others. Of course, it was said, the military coup in Turkey was a "misfortune." But it was one of those strange "misfortunes" that can easily develop into a "blessing" for Greece and the right.... Therefore, everybody was satisfied: Washington, NATO, the EEC and "our own" New Democracy....

Seldom has the public confronted such manifestations of blunt cynicism and provocative contempt of man's most elementary rights. This time the imperialists did not even maintain pretexts and in unison with them the local rightwing "unofficially" murmured that the persecution of a people, terrorist violence and fascist prisons created "favorable prospects" for Greek national interests! Public conscience was not only provoked by the lack of democratic sensitivity and the toleration and glorification of the abhorrent crime but by the clear feeling about what will befall Greece itself, skillfully covered over the cloak of "discreet" government euphoria. Essentially, the coup of the Turkish generals constitutes the first phase of a broader plan for stabilizing and strengthening imperialist positions in the Eastern Mediterranean. The following have also been planned:

Our country's "return" to the NATO military wing. At least the U.S. ambassador did not leave Mitsotakis room to worry.... His assurances were explicit and categorical.

The final settlement of the "outstanding" issue of U.S. bases. The plan of agreement for the bases arrived in Athens behind the tanks of the Turkish militarists. Some "clarifications" on technical issues and everything will be ready for signing....

The total settlement of Greek-Turkish differences on the basis of the well-known Camp David formula and the promotion of "double enosis" with regard to the problem of Cyprus, the "daughter fatherland" of General Evren!

Consequently, upon what is the government's optimism and expectations based? Are they based on the futile "hope" that the Ankara chauvinists will moderate their demands? But, even so, the solutions that are being planned are still Atlantic solutions and the substantial points of reconfinement [to NATO], retention of foreign bases, and the slaughter of Cyprus remain in full. The public's uneasiness is well founded and justified because behind the backstage plans of NATO it perceives very clearly the intention to commit our country and its future course to the road of Atlanticism and dependence and to create "faits accomplis" that will outline prospects for democratic change within the desirable boundaries of mere government change. However, from where does the New Democracy government derive such "rights?" Who and when has authorized the right to define the fortunes and future of the Greek people behind their backs? As Secretary Genral Kharilaos Florakis has declared, the KKE does not acknowledge the government's right to reconfine Greece to NATO or renew the agreement for the U.S. bases. It does not acknowledge this right of the government not only because it is a government of the minority but also because for this action it does not even have the authorization of the voters who once were deceived by its preelection demagory. Essentially this concerns an effort to blatantly violate popular will--the will of the overwhelming majority of our people, regardless of specific ideological-political convictions. The government, however, should have no delusions. "Faits accomplis" will never be accepted nor will they save its party. The road to change, with more or fewer obstacles, is certainly the one our country will also follow.

One of the terrorists who attacked Aykut Genc was later identified as Alaettin Aycicek, born in 1958 in Istanbul and a former student at the Vefa high school. VOTCP CRITICIZES JUNTA, ARRESTS OF UNION LEADERS

[Station commentary]

[Text] After he dissolved the Turkish Grand National Assembly and banned all political activities, Evren, the head of the junta that seized power, said that power was only temporarily seized. Evren, on the one hand, claims that the seizure is temporary and yet, on the other, postpones the general elections due in June 1981. This proves that Evren is a liar. The military junta has completely suppressed all democratic rights and liberties. Statements to the effect that democracy will soon return are only directed at deceiving our people in the country and the widest circles abroad that would express their solidarity with our people and our people's democratic struggle.

The aim of the junta generals is to crush the democratic forces and to consolidate the fierce exploitative rule of a handful of collaborationist and monopolist bosses like Saban, Koc and Narin. As a matter of fact the representatives of the collaborationist monopolist capital are expressing, one after the other, their support for the junta.

The junta generals are openly violating basic human rights and liberties. The military junta has officially announced that Turkey does not recognize the international act of human rights and has notified the Council of Europe accordingly. The junta is continuing to arrest the unionists, the union representatives at work sites, officials of worker parties in cities and towns, the RPP patriots, the Kurdish democrats as well as NSP members with an anti-imperialist stand. During this process the junta is attacking everything connected with the democratic system. Everyone, including mayors of cities and towns--elected by the people--are being removed from their posts and supporters of the militarist clique are being assigned in their places.

All these prove that the junta generals are not in power for a short while, for a long period by using force. They are announcing that during this period, they are going to materialize the political goals set by the reactionary and fascist parties and that they are going to prepare a reactionary constitution, election law and party law. Thus, the junta generals are already proclaiming that they are going to prepare the legislation necessary for a tyrannical rule. They are going to outlaw the political parties and organizations as well as trade unions which safeguard the interests of the great majority of the people including workers, toilers, peasants, artisans, small and medium enterprises, in short everyone in the working class and certain segments of the bourgeoisie.

Citizens, do not believe in statements by a handful of members of an armed gang--the lackets of U.S. imperialism and the monopolist bosses--who are trying to deceive you by promises of returning to democracy. They are the enemies of our national interests. Democracy shall return only through the struggle of all the progressive, patriotic, democratic and peace-loving persons. Democracy can be restored only by abolishing the pro-American and pro-NATOite junta.

Citizens, the junta generals are lying to you. They are fanning the differences of sect, religion, language and race with the fiercest and most tyrannical methods. The attacks they are conducting against the Kurdish people in eastern Anatolia are the proof of their stand. They are making efforts to hinder the unity of the Turkish and Kurdish peoples against imperialism's reactionary and fascist forces and their blood-stained lackeys, and to disrupt the two peoples living next to each other in brotherhood, free and with equal rights.

The junta generals are the bloody tools of the plot prepared by the U.S. imperialists against our country and people. They represent the striking force of U.S. imperialism in our region against our people as well as other brotherly countries.

Turkish and Kurdish communists, patriots, democrats, toilers and intellectuals, let us not despair. Let us raise the banner of unity--despite the seeds of hostility which the junta generals are trying to sow between the Turkish and Kurdish peoples--in a bid to topple the pro-American junta generals, and to insure the liberty and brotherhood of our peoples.

Today, more than ever, we need unity against imperialism, fascism and chauvinism. Let us not forget that no tyrannical force can halt the struggle being waged by peoples for their national and social liberation, and will never be able to do so. The pro-American generals of the junta will be toppled as were the torturing generals of 12 March [1971 military intervention]. Moreover, when they are toppled this time the democratic forces will be strong enough to make them account for their deeds.

Appeal for Workers' Opposition

TA180818 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] Thousands of workers' representatives are being arrested and jailed by the martial law commands. Great pressure is being applied on the union leaders under arrest, but the whereabouts of many others is unknown. The junta is concealing this information from the people. The working class will defend its representatives.

The workers are preparing for different forms of resistance in accordance with the existing conditions in the country in a bid to secure the release of Turkish workers representatives and their return to work. The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] protests the arrest of workers and unionists. The TCP calls on workers representatives not to surrender to the junta. Unite against the junta.

Arrest, Antiunion Activity

TA180827 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] It is reported that 254 representatives and administrators from the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] and its affiliated organizations have been arrested in Istanbul. A total of 254 persons composed of the administrators, branch leaders and representatives of DISK and all its affiliated unions--which have been closed down in accordance with communique No 3 issued by the junta--called the National Security Council--have been arrested in Istanbul and sent to various prisons. It meanwhile reported that mass arrests are continuing in the various regions of the country. Especially the workers representatives at work places in which strikes are being staged are being arrested on grounds that they are inciting the workers to strike. All the deposits in the banks of DISK and its affiliated unions have been seized in accordance with a National Security Council order. There has been reaction to the confiscation of the Workers' union fees by the junta. It is reported that all the documents and furniture at the union headquarters and branches have been confiscated by the martial law commands.

TERCUMAN COMMENTS ON INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS ON CYPRUS

NC170843 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 16 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Fahir Armaoglu: "Talks in Cyprus"]

[Text] The second round of the intercommunal talks which were resumed on 9 August after an interval of 14 months, thanks to the efforts of UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, is being held in Nicosia today. There is not much ground, however, for hope about the outcome of these talks. For although the principle of a bizonal state was accepted at the 9 August meeting, Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou, at a press conference held immediately after this meeting, caused deep frustration by saying that the Greek Cypriot side identified itself not with a bizonal but with a federal system. On the other hand, these second intercommunal talks coincide with the opening of the UN General Assembly. It is impossible for the UN General Assembly not to affect the attitude of the Greek Cypriot side at the intercommunal talks because the Greek Cypriot side and Greece have not yet abandoned the mania of using the UN resolutions as a trump card against Turkey.

Nevertheless, the intercommunal talks this time are being held in a totally different atmosphere compared with the talks held a month ago. The administration has changed in Turkey and the government now in power's quite different from its predecessor in character. It is highly probable that this new situation will have a mellowing effect on theattitude of the Greek Cypriots and Greece and that it will cause them to adopt a more flexible policy; the change of administration in Turkey may drive Greek Cypriots and Greece toward a more realistic policy. Naturally, the course of the talks will prove how true these speculations are.

There is another point which we must stress: This is the reaction of the Middle East countries which play an effective role in the adoption of the UN resolutions on Cyprus. Apart from a message from the king of Saudi Arabia saying he was in sympathy with head of state and National Security Council President Gen Kenan Evren, the other Middle East countries have not reacted yet. It is being observed that, compared with the optimistic and approving comments from the West, the Middle East countries have adopted a taciturn stand. We interpret this to mean that the attitude of these countries in the UN General Assembly will be different this time. Consequently, the Greek Cypriots and Greece will have to take into account this factor as well in this second round of talks.

OPEC SECRETARY GENERAL ORTIZ ANNOUNCES AGREEMENT

AU180927 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Excerpt] OPEC is always good for a surprise. The consultative meeting suddenly proclaimed itself a valid extraordinary oil ministers conference and OPEC Secretary General Rene Ortiz announced at about 2230:

[Begin Ortiz recording in English] After reviewing this market situation and the OPEC price structure in light of the market trends unanimously decided [as heard]:

1. To fix the price of market crude Arabian light 34 API--(extrastenura)--at the level of $30 U.S. per barrel.

2. To freeze the other official prices of OPEC member countries' crudes at their present levels.

3. This decision will apply until the next ordinary meeting of the conference. [end recording]

And this oil ministers conference will take place in mid-December in Indonesia, that is after the OPEC summit meeting in November in Baghdad.

SAUDI, AUSTRIAN FOREIGN MINISTERS COMMENT ON RELATIONS

AU181137 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1600 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Ferdinand Hennerbichler interview with Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal in English, and with Austrian Foreign Minister Pahr; date and place not given--recorded portions enclosed in quotation marks]

[Text] With respect to the general cooperation treaty Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal stated that he hopes for a conclusion. The dossiers are still being studied. Final agreements could be concluded at the forthcoming visit by Foreign Minister Pahr to Saudi Arabia.

[Faysal] "We hope to reach an agreement about cooperation in the economic field. It is an initiative we are studying now and I hope that we will finalize it during the visit of his excellency to my country."

Second, and no less than a central economic problem for Austria: Saudi Arabian oil deliveries. The situation is as follows: During his state visit to Saudi Arabia last spring Federal Chancellor Kreisky concluded the first delivery contract which has been in effect since last May and is applicable until 1982. Since that time--19 May 1980--we have been receiving Saudi oil, something which, apart from the oil multinationals Mobil and Esso, hardly anybody in the world has been able to achieve. We are receiving a total of 1.75 million barrels--159 liters per barrel--annually from Saudi Arabia. This is something less than 15 percent of all of our annual oil purchases abroad; and the price is right, because at $28 per barrel it is significantly below world market prices, which are $40 or more. During Prince Sa'ud's visit, there were no separate talks about oil deliveries, but the old willingness has quite obviously been reaffirmed on the Saudi Arabian side to double oil deliveries after 1982. This can in any case be concluded from all the contacts between experts that have taken place thus far. the Saudi Arabian foreign minister told me in this context only in very general terms today that Austria is a good trade partner for the Saudis, the oil deal also is part and parcel of it, that a solid basis has now been created and that the relations should be continued in the interest of the two countries.

[Faysal] "Let me say this: We are a good trading partner with Austria and oil as a commodity is not beyong the scope of this partnership. We hope that we now have a solid background in this and that the relationship will continue to the interest of both countries."

Another topic: The Middle East. Prince Sa'ud praised the Austrian Middle East policy as being just and as a very essential contribution to a peaceful solution of the Middle East conflict.

Two peripheral topics: The Saudis allegedly want to buy shares of the Steyr-Daimler-Puch Corporation. To what extent is still uncertain, but some 100 Steyr tanks could be delivered to Saudi Arabia instead of Chile. But both these things are still only rumors. I have not been unable to obtain any comment from the Steyr-Daimler-Puch works today because the only authorized spokesman of the enterprise on such matters, Director General Malzacher, is currently abroad. Finally, how does Austria see the Saudi Arabian state visit? Foreign Minister Pahr:

[Pahr] "To me the most important outcome economically is the readiness to conclude an economic cooperation agreement. We have been striving for such an agreement since 1974."

And what about the hoped-for oil deliveries? Do we have any chances?

[Pahr] "I think that we have a very good agreement about deliveries of Saudi Arabian oil to Austria and I know that the Austrian oil corporation is very much satisfied with the present system."

To sum things up: Good relations between Austria and Saudi Arabia without problems, satisfaction on both sides, and hopes chiefly in the economic field.

KREISKY ON TANK SALES TO CHILE, SAUDI ARABIA

AU161440 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1000 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Erich Aichinger report on Chancellor Kreisky's press conference given in the Federal Chancellery in Vienna on 16 September]

[Excerpts] It had been most recently Freedom Party Chairman Steger who suspected that the export of Steyr Kuerassier tanks to Chile, abandoned after massive protests, could after all be effected through some backdoors, perhaps via France. Today Federal Chancellor Kreisky stated:

[Begin Kreisky recording] We have only heard here--and this was also reported today--that efforts are being made on the part of the Steyr Corporation to reexport the turrets back to France where they came from. I do not regard it as very likely that an export can be brought about this way. In addition, I hear that the Chilean side has decided in favor of another delivery, a delivery from other countries, and of entirely different equipment. That is what I hear. I do not know whether it is true or not. [end recording]

Asked whether there was any moral difference in delivering tanks to Chile or to Saudi Arabia, Kreisky said that morality was not involved here, but once made the decision to manufacture such equipment was also in the interest of the Austrian Federal Army. If somebody wants to change it and thinks that he possesses the required backing he should initiate a pertinent referendum.

RAILROAD WORKERS IN W. BERLIN SET UP STRIKE COMMITTEE

[Summary] Berlin, 18 Sep (DPA)--The striking West Berlin workers of the GDR Reichsbahn have threatened that they will stop passenger traffic and the service trains of the Western allies between Berlin and the Federal Republic.

A meeting of some 300 striking railroad workers at the Berlin-Moabit container station this afternoon set up a central strike committee representing 20 West Berlin Reichsbahn offices. Strike action against passenger traffic is being considered unless the East Berlin Reichsbahn Directorate immediately declares its readiness to negotiate. By tonight no contact between the strikers and the directorate had been established.

In its first resolution the strike committee called for support for its demand for a DM160 wage increase, a terminable wage agreement, freely elected trade union representatives and social improvements. Moreover, all workers fired for taking part in strikes in the past should be reinstated.

The East Berlin "transport police" are meanwhile reported to have occupied the central electric power supply station of the S-Bahn at Halansee to prevent the current from being turned off.

Plan of Action

LD182240 Hamburg DPA in German 2002 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Summary] Berlin, 18 Sep (DPA)--A meeting of striking West Berlin workers of the GDR Reichsbahn decided tonight that the signal boxes at Moabit, Spandau and Grunewald should remain occupied during the night to prevent the S-Bahn being seized by the Reichsbahn railway police. The strikers said that action by the raiway police is expected sometime during the night. They have also received information that the GDR will sent about 200 Reichsbahn men from East Berlin to West Berlin tomorrow to maintain S-Bahn services.

Press Review on Strike

DW190843 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Press Review on strike by West Berlin Reichsbahn workers]

[Text] MANNHEIMER MORGEN writes: It is questionable whether the strike of the West Berlin railway workers will become a social-political powderkeg for the whole GDR. However, West Berlin is closer than Poland, and the strikers are employees of a GDR enterprise. This difference will probably prompt the GDR top echelon to attribute to events in the West Berlin railway sphere at least as much attention as to those at the Gdansk shipyard, although all this is taking place in a much smailer framework than the Polish events.

BERLINER MORGENPOST asks: Must East Berlin not fear that the spark of discontent might jump over to the Reichsbahn workers in the GDR? Must it not fear that something like the spirit of Gdansk will emanate from the Heidestrasse container terminal? But there is a strategic difference between Berlin and Gdansk, between the GDR and Poland. Two Soviet divisions are stationed in Poland, 20 in the GDR. The GDR lies between Poland and the West. The GDR, however, is a border area with the West. He who lays his hand on the logistic nerves of the Soviet empire at its outer border will no longer be dealing with the Reichsbahn Directorate, but rather with Moscow's direct security interests.

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN notes: Any creaks that show up in the East-West Berlin mechanism have an immediate effect on the whole city. Difficulties come up not only with regard to supplies for West Berlin's economy, but passenger transportation can also be handicapped quickly. In most cases, however, the treaties that have been concluded with the GDR as well as the Quadripartite Agreement of 1971 have prevented the development of serious crises. It will be interesting to see how the GDR brings the strike under control. Mediation in this affair is not a matter for the Senat or Bonn; it falls under the jurisdiction of the four powers, who decided in 1971 not to change the existing situation in the city.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE Commentary

DW190921 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 19 Sep 80 p 12

[Commentary signed Fr. "Reichsbahn Legacy"]

[Text] A legacy of postwar times is catching up with the GDR leadership, a legacy that has been preserved because the Soviet Union and thus the GDR itself wanted to keep a foot in West Berlin. This piece of the past is called "Deutsche Reichsbahn." Strangely enough the GDR kept the "Reichsbahn" after 1945. That was in connection with agreements of the Allies. The city, which was first divided into four parts and later split between the East and the West in 1948, left the operating rights of the Reichsbahn area and the S-Bahn to the Reichsbahn without, however, giving it sovereignty rights. The list of conflicts emanating from the strange division is long. Once the cut through Berlin was made on 13 August 1961, a kind of freely floating Reichsbahn came about in West Berlin, with employees living mainly in the West but belonging to East Berlin when it comes to the labor law. It contains the disadvantage for the GDR that wages must be paid in Western marks, but that seemed to be offset by its maintaining a presence in West Berlin.

Now, however, the Reichsbahn workers living in West Berlin are no longer content with their wages. They are doing something that is impossible in the GDR; they are striking. This is quite understandable: The Western Reichsbahn workers, whether they have joined the West Berlin branch of the SED out of opportunism or tradition or whether they have joined the alleged trade union federation FDGB, all experience the living standard of workers in the West. East Berlin still has certain holds on its Western Reichsbahn workers: There are cheap recreation tours to the Harz mountains or the Baltic Sea, there is the security of a state job and old age benefits. But these workers, in contrast to all the others in the GDR, are still "free"--if they quit, the regime cannot do anything.

So the strike by the S-Bahn workers in West Berlin has nothing at all to do with what has happened in Poland. An anachronistic exclave of the GDR regime is getting a bit out of control. But the GDR is about to demonstrate to the West the dangers this holds for the West: The tracks on which the trains from the Federal Republic travel to Berlin belong to the operational area of the Reichsbahn. In the end, will Bonn pay the wage difference for the Reichsbahn workers and in this way end the "strike"?

[Report by Bonn correspondent Heinz Vielain]

[Text] Bonn--Soviet arms plants are producing ammunition for the guns of the Red Army with German help. The supplier is Germany's largest machine tool producer, Gildemeister AG in Bielefeld, with Westdeutsche Landesbank being one of the main shareholders.

According to work plans obtained by DIE WELT, the Germans who are involved in the deal know very well what is to be produced by the machines supplied by Gildemeister.

Under the term "workpiece family," the following items are named: shell heads; weapons parts; fuse parts and shell casings. Under "part description" the following can be found: shell noses, fuses, fuse casings. "Stankoimport" appears repeatedly as the name of the customer. This is the state import center of the USSR.

Example 1: Order number 080126 through 080131, machine type 373, contained in the list, deals with the production of shell noses (40 x 70 millimeters).

Example 2: The machine types 355 and 385 supplied to Moscow--order numbers contain numerous orders--are suitable for the production of weapons parts and heavy caliber shell casings.

Gildemeister began trading with the East in 1972. The first "machine tools" (painted green with a Glasodur cover) left in December for the Soviet Union via In Furth Im Walde and through the CSSR. By the end of the year Gildemeister reported a turnover of 150 million in business with the Russians.

In September 1973 the then chairman of the board of directors, Karl-Bernhard Grautoff, surprised the press with the statement that in about 5 years Gildemeister would start production in the Soviet Union. Corresponding negotiations have been in progress for some time. Quite some headway was made in talks with Pavlov, the Soviet minister for machine building, at the Hannover machine tool exhibition.

Grautoff said at that time that within the framework of a cooperation agreement between Gildemeister and Soviet authorities signed in Moscow, a "new kind of machine tool" would be developed.

In response to questions by DIE WELT, Horst Goehren, spokesman for the Gildemeister board of directors, said yesterday that the management did not know the machines supplied to the Soviet Union were used in the arms industry. "However, these are machines one can also use for armament. I must admit that," he said.

Asked whether the machines exported to the Soviet Union did not require an export license from Bonn because they might fall under the stipulations of the war arms bill, Goehren told DIE WELT: "Everything that has been supplied was released for shipment and is not subject to any embargo stipulations."

The "work plans" available to DIE WELT stem from 1980. The Soviet invasions of Afghanistan began on 27 December 1979.

NC181740 Paris AFP in English 1717 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 18 Sep (AFP)--British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher arrived here today for a summit meeting with French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing tomorrow.

Mrs. Thatcher, accompanied by Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour, Chancellor of the Exchequer (Finance Minister) Sir Geoffrey Howe, Trade Minister John Nott and Industry Minister Sir Keith Joseph, landed from England at Villacoublay Air Base outside Paris.

After the Paris summit, Mrs. Thatcher will go on to Bordeaux to attend meetings of the Franco-British Council.

Sir Ian Gilmour replaced Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, who was suffering from a slight infection.

Talks Marked by 'Trust and Cordiality'

NC191208 Paris AFP in English 1157 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 19 Sep (AFP)--An atmosphere of "trust and cordiality" marked talks here today between Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing. During a breakfast and private talk afterwards lasting 90 minutes in all the two leaders kept off the still prickly subject of their differences within the European Economic Community (EEC), French sources indicated afterwards. Instead the discussion concentrated on global issues, including Iran, East-West relations and problems of defence and strategy, the sources said.

The French indicated earlier their reluctance to discuss Europe in depth, saying it should be left to the Nine together and the competent officials in Brussels to work out detailed solutions to problems, but it was thought that the British would still bring the subject up at some time during the summit.

Later in the morning, the two leaders were joined by French Prime Minister Raymond Barre, Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet, and British Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour, replacing Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, who is ill. The hour-long discussions covered Afghanistan and the forthcoming conference on security and cooperation in Europe (CSCE) in Madrid, the sources said. Afterward the two prime ministers left in the same car for Mr. Barre's official residence for further talks. They were to return to the presidential Elysee Palace for lunch with the president.

Mrs. Thatcher, dressed in black, shook hands with a smiling Mr. Giscard d'Estaing as she left with Mr Barre. The general atmosphere appeared a good deal warmer than in London last November where the EEC budget row dominated everything.

In the afternoon a full session of talks was scheduled, involving, as well as those who took part in the morning's talks, British Industry Minister Sir Keith Joseph, Trade Minister John Nott and Chancellor of the Exchequer Sir Geoffrey Howe. On the French side would be Finance and Economy Minister Rene Monoury, Industry Minister Andre Giraud, Transport Minister Joel le Theule and Foreign Ministry secretary with special responsibility for Europe Pierre Bernard-Raymond.

After a press conference at the end of the talks, Mrs. Thatcher will fly to Bordeaux, where she is to give a major speech at a conference of the Anglo-French Council, a non-governmental body acting as a forum for the discussion of issues of common interest to the two countries.

LE MATIN REPORTS BARRE REMARKS ON DEFENSE CONCEPT

LD180933 Paris LE MATIN in French 12 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] "We are directly concerned by the security of our immediate neighbors in Europe and consequently cannot remain indifferent to any action affecting their freedom." Raymond Barre asserted this once again during the opening session of the Higher National Defense Studies Institute's 33d session yesterday. National defense cannot be regarded in an isolated, "restrictive" way. The premier tried to illustrate this: "France is indeed directly concerned by the confrontations, crises and conflicts taking place in the world: First in Europe, where our vital interests lie and where close solidarity and common interests bind us to our neighbors; and overseas, where some of our departments and territories lie and where there are friendly countries to which we are attached by many ties; indeed, everywhere on land and sea where freedom of trade and transit is necessary to our country's economic life."

While expounding this very broad notion of national defense, Raymond Barre stated that we intend "to continue to control our forces' involvement," just as we intend to avoid being drawn into a conflict when our "vital interests are not threatened." Those who see in the government chief's remarks a considerable tendency to bend the notion of independent defense will point out that, as soon as a conflict breaks out in Europe, France will be automatically involved. They will point out that on the basis of Raymond Barre's remarks, France will be forced to engage its forces in the battle as soon as it happens.

Being a deterrent force--the premier was anxious to stress this--the national defense system is based on nuclear armaments, including the enhanced radiation weapon or neutron bomb. In this context Raymond Barre expressed the view that since the neutron weapon is "primarily a nuclear weapon" it still has the restricted uses and nature of a significant gesture at the strategic level. As such it would naturally take its place in our deterrent system, in some cases replacing existing tactical nuclear weapons. As is known, the Socialists have reservations on this question and the Communists deny that the neutron bomb has a deterrent role and see it as a new proof of the Atlantist swing. However, the premier made it clear that our security must not be based on the neutron weapon alone, and that we must not try to find "some Great Wall of China behind which to shelter." In this period of budget planning, Raymond Barre pointed out that defense funds are up by 17.9 percent while those of other ministries' "remain at the same level," adding that "this growth cannot be unlimited without running the risk of jeopardizing economic development." He said therefore that the objective is to "make every effort to use the money allotted to our armed forces in the best possible way."

Finally, on the subject of civil defense the premier stated categorically that this notion is "outdated." According to him, for a country with a relatively small surface area and dense population like France, "the real protection against bombardment lies in the deterrent force." As is known, this view was strongly disputed in a recent report drawn up by Senators Raymond Marcelin and Edouard Bonnefous. They refute the deterrent idea and point out that in a country like the Soviet Union the financial effort amounts to Fr34 per inhabitant as against 60 centimes in France.

BARRE REVIEWS ECONOMY OF PAST 4 YEARS

LD181447 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Sep 80 p 37

[Text] In an article published in the September edition of LA REVUE DES DEUX MONDES Mr Barre comments on the 4 years during which he has been in charge of the French economy. He has tried to ensure, he writes, that the policy he has pursued, which has been strongly affected by the international situation, is "practical and coherent."

"It has not been an expression of any doctrinaire concept of the economy. It has been planned on a factual basis, that is, based on a situation determined by trends and restraints. It has been no hodgepodge of different measures but has taken the form of a global and continuous action." Its two objectives, which have been pursued "unfalteringly for 4 years," have been "struggle against inflation and adaptation by the French economy to the situation."

The struggle against inflation--Mr Barre asserts that he intended to break with "the generally accepted concept" that it is possible to seek to ensure full employment through rapid expansion as long as it is paid for by periodic devaluation. "I have been tirelessly repeating," he writes, "that inflation in fact represents the gravest threat to both growth and employment."

In order to halt inflation, Mr Barre has limited the increase in the amount of money in circulation (11.5 percent per annum in June 1980), pursued a "restrictive budget policy" (a Fr35 billion deficit on average since 1978) and sought to moderate wage increases (a 1 percent annual increase in the purchasing power of wage earners paid on an hourly basis in Arpil 1980 compared with a 4.7 percent increase in 1976) and to stabilize the franc, that "cornerstone" of the policy pursued. This has made possible, Mr Barre believes, "a gradual disinflation without, however, leading to deflation which our country could obviously not have withstood for social and psychological reasons."

The premier blames mainly "international factors" for a sharp prices increase in 1979-1980--the oil price increase alone represented one-fifth of the total in the current year. However, "a considerable deceleration can be expected" in the second half of the year. As for the rest, which amounted to a 9 percent annual price increase, the premier offers two explanations: "The government did not want to greatly reduce the French people's purchasing power.... I am willing to accept the criticism that the government's policy could have been even stricter. I would answer such criticisms by saying that politics is the art of realizing when you should stop."

Mr Barre describes the "structural features of the French economy: the important agricultural sector whose prices represent the main factor in the formation of incomes; the large public industrial sector which receives very large state subsidies and whose prices have long remained lower than costs; a very heterogeneous services and distribution sector in which competition has been developed insufficiently to prevent excessive margins; and, finally, tacit wage indexing connected with either a contractual policy or various regulations."

After admitting that the deficit in current payments would amount to "some Fr30 billion" this year--a deficit "considerably smaller" than in other countries, including the FRG, Mr Barre asserts that the government "has opted for a growth induced by offers, that is, innovation, investments and exports rather than for a growth resulting from consumer demand." Obviously, as a result of this kind of growth, which has been restricted by "the oil check" and the "international economic situation," unemployment has increased: Almost 1.5 million people are now seeking work.

Adaptation by the French economy--According to Mr Barre, it has been marked by an "energy redeployment" (the proportion of oil in energy consumption being reduced from 67 percent to 57 percent over a 6 year period) and a "release of productivity forces: abolition of state controls and discontinuance of state intervention; halt to a movement toward general social assistance, restoration of a sense of responsibility and willingness to take risks, end to a price freeze; reduction in indispensable manpower; transformation of traditional relations between public enterprises and the state; and alleviation of foreign exchange control to the advantage of enterprises."

The agriculatural sector, which has considerably increased its productivity, "must embark on the path of 'a second agricultural revolution' in order to fully use the great potential which France possesses in a world in which natural resources play a paramount role. This second agricultural revolution will mark the coming 10 years."

A "profound reorganization of the existing industries and a forceful development of industries of the future" have already secured for France "an enviable position in high technology spheres--the nuclear and computer spheres, the telephone and telecommunications industry and in the aircraft construction and spatial sectors--will secure for it such a position in biology in the near future... "Since 1976 I have believed that France's future mainly depends on its ability to face up to economic challenges in the coming years.... The fact that I have opted for this form of attack did not mean that I intended to confine myself to narrow economism or monetarism. On the contrary my aim was to provide a main motivation for government action." Any "work in hand" will have to be "brought to a successful conclusion." In conclusion, Mr Barre points out to "three guidelines for the future: "effort, competitiveness and (individual or collective) initiative."

SDECE OFFICIAL RESIGNS; DISAGREEMENTS ON AFRICA ALLEGED

LD181531 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Sep 80 pp 1, 17

[Text] Col Alain de Gaigneron de Marolles has resigned as director of intelligence with the Foreign Intelligence and Counterintelligence Service (SDECE), the French secret services, after occupying this position for only 1 year.

Since Mr Alexandre de Marenches' appointment as SDECE director general 10 years ago, the service has had five directors, and in the past 4 years Colonel de Gaigneron de Marolles is the third man to leave this important post--which involves gathering information of all kinds, its analysis for the government and the handling of "sources" abroad--at the end of a short spell in office.

At the Defense Ministry, on which the SDECE depends administratively and financially, no one is prepared to comment on this departure. It is being hinted, however, that it took place at the request of the person concerned several weeks ago now "for technical reasons." Colonel de Marolles succeeded Gen Rene Candelier in October 1979. His successor has not yet been named.

Trained at Saint-Cyr and a former paratroop officer, 53-year-old Count Alain de Gaigneron de Marolles was a SDECE member of long standing. He was promoted to the rank of colonel 4 years ago. Before being appointed head of intelligence, to which Mr de Marenches decided in 1979 to give priority by reorientating his service's general activities, and which includes, among other things, the "political" sections of the research service and of the analysis service, Colonel de Marolles was chief of the "action" service which is responsible for external operations.

When head of the "action" service, Colonel de Marolles was accused by the Israeli secret services of having helped to coordinate Egypt's military activities against Libya at a time when the dispute between these two countries developed into a military confrontation at their border in July 1977. More recently, it was also he who was suspected on the basis of information emanating from the same source of trying to encourage, as newly appointed director of intelligence, the formation of a Libyan Government in exile which was apparently waiting for an uprising of certain sections of the population in the Benghazi region before going back to its country.

Did the last mentioned plan fail? For the time being, complete mystery remains about the nature of the incidents or cases of espionage uncovered in the Tobruk region in August 1980 and revealed from Arab diplomatic sources in Rabat and Cairo.

These Israeli accusations have been rejected in Paris by official circles which deny that any apparent failure of such operations, which have rightly or wrongly been attributed to Colonel de Marolles, could have led to the changes which have taken place among the chiefs of the SDECE intelligence department. It is a tradition adhered to in all countries that no comments are made on any setbacks--whenever they occur--suffered by the secret services.

For instance, official circles also did not try to justify, at the time, the dispatch to Riyadh of Colonel Gillier--one of their best specialists on Arab questions--who was to consult with the Saudi intelligence services just prior to the mutiny in Mecca in November-December 1979, which shook the dynasty.

Despite the official authorities' reticence about the real reasons for Colonel de Marolles' departure after only 12 months in office, it seems that a disagreement has nonetheless occured within the SDECE on the policy to be pursued in North Africa and black Africa, leading to technical blunders in the sphere of "manipulation" and to the fact that the director of intelligence finally submitted his resignation which was immediately accepted by his superiors.

Libya's direct or indirect influence in the Maghreb and certain French-speaking countries in black Africa--where it intervenes sometimes militarily through interposed forces but more often by means of considerable financial support--can lead to grave risks of local "destabilization," especially in countries like Chad and Central Africa where existing French interests are believed to be of strategic importance and where the Tripoli leaders know how to turn the errors of a policy, determined in Paris, to their own advantage.

Irrespective of what the reasons for changing the head of SDECE intelligence might be, it must be noted that this departure indicates a disturbing instability at the head of this service. With the exception of General Jeannou Lacaze, who was effectively in charge from April 1971 through June 1976, three officers occupied this office in succession with varying luck.

Following the dismissal in the second half of 1977 of Col Bernard Grue, who remained in office just under 18 months and whose entourage was probably the target of internal machinations if agents who regret his departure are to be believed, Mr de Marenches appointed Brigade Gen Rene Candelier, a former military security deputy director, as director of intelligence and Colonel Crignola as head of the research service. General Candelier, who was always ready to comply with Mr de Marenches' wishes and was criticized by some of his subordinates, was allowed in October 1979 to take advantage of his right to retirement. Colonel Crignola, who was often criticized for his dogmatism and ambition by his aides in the research service, was replaced within some 6 months. It was under these circumstances that Colonel de Marolles' appointment was proposed.

The--probably excessive--turnover of directors of intelligence--the SDECE's most important branch--does not befit an institution which should seek, as a matter of priority, continually to improve the quality of its output. It can even become an additional handicap to the service's normal performance.

Some agents deplore this and, furthermore, regret the fact that the director general, who is anxious to have private talks with his personal informers at the highest level, travels abroad all too frequently. Mr de Marenches has made many unexpected or secret trips either alone or accompanied by his adviser, Dr Yves Beccuau. The service's operations have rather suffered as a result even though the SDECE director general, who will be 60 in May 1981, recently informed people close to him of his intention to reduce the number of his trips, which are beginning to tire him.

PCF'S ANDRIEU SCORES MITTERRAND 'SYMPATHY' FOR POLISH WORKERS

[Editorial by PCF Central Committee member Rene Andrieu: "Lapse of Memory"]

[Text] F. Mitterrand loves the workers--provided they are not French and democracy--provided he is not in government. Those were the thoughts which sprang immediately to mind yesterday as I listened to him discussing the situation in Poland on the Europe 1 Press Club program.

On this occasion the PS first secretary did not fail to extol trade union freedom and the right to strike and to denounce what he calls "the tragic failure of a society which claims to be a workers society."

It is true that Poland is experiencing a serious crisis, and the fact that the aspirations of its working class, as our special envoy Jacques Estager rightly points out, could only be expressed by a wave of strikes proves the absence of real dialogue between the government and the country and highlights the inadequate development of socialist democracy.

It is probably this last problem which lies at the heart of the debate. The problems of daily life, however serious they might be, cannot make us forget that in the last 10 years under Gierek's leadership Poland has become a modern industrial state, doubling its production potential, creating 3 million jobs, stamping out unemployment and increasing its inhabitants' incomes.

Nonetheless the strength of the strike movement shows a degree of discontent which cannot merely be explained by the action of "antisocialist elements" even though these elements--it would be surprising if this were not the case--are trying to exploit the situation.

In any case the Polish Government has chosen negotiation and refused to send out the police against the strikers. No blood has been spilled in the Gdansk shipyards.

F. Mitterrand might do better to think about the complexity of the Polish situation before pronouncing his anathema and denouncing the "tragic failure" of socialism in the Eastern bloc countries.

He might--indeed he certainly would--do better to think about that. He has nerve to portray himself as a champion of trade union freedom and the right to strike when he was a member of governments--in 1947 and 1948 in particular--which distinguished themselves by brutal--and even bloody--repression against the French workers movement.

A report presented by Benoit Franchon to the CGT in October 1950 revealed that from 1947 to 1950 13 workers were killed and thousands more wounded or imprisoned for defending the right to strike in France. Some 3,500 workers were prosecuted and 1,200 found guilty; 3,900 workers in various administrative departments were subjected to administrative santions ranging as far as dismissal. Thousands of workers in private industry were fired. In the miners' strike alone, 2,500 strikers were prosecuted, with 844 sentenced to a total of 150 years' imprisonment and fined a total of Fr168,386,000.

Among those who lost their lives there was a miner killed by the forces or repression at Merlebach on 8 October 1948. He was called Bartel Jansek and was of Polish origin. F. Mitterrand, who was a minister at that time, apparently did not have the same gushing sympathy for the workers in this country as he now feels.

I could continue to give examples. It is enough to recall a number of facts which people should not have the effrontery to forget.

F. Mitterrand is now paying tribute to "the Polish working class' lucidity and courage," but his sincerity would be more convincing if he had not supported the repression of the French working class when he was in government. He is portraying the situation in Poland in an apocalyptic light and is placing so much emphasis on the idea that there will be a confrontation between Warsaw and Moscow that one wonders whether he is hoping for that to happen.

We hope those hopes will be dashed and that the Poles will be able both to preserve what they have achieved and progress along the path to socialist democracy.

POLITICAL DEBATE CONTINUES ON BERLINGUER SPEECH IN BOLOGNA

AU181037 Rome Ansa in English 0850 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--The speech delivered by Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer in Bologna on Sunday continues as the focus of political debate here.

Berlinguer said that his party would continue with its tough opposition to the present government led by Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga. The government is a three-way coalition of Christian Democrats (DC), Republicans (PRI) and Socialists (PSI).

According to former PSI Secretary Francesco de Martino, who is generally seen as on the left of his party, not everyone in the PSI agrees with the "harsh and unusual tones" used against Berlinguer's speech in the Socialist Party's daily, L'AVANTI. De Martino also said he could not understand the "reasons and utility" for exasperating political polemic at a time "difficulties in which it is certainly of no interest to increase tension on the left".

In the same tone, the PSI's Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile told the RAI Radio-Television Network that the "tones of... the polemic which is developing on the left is deeply harmful, precisely for the equilibria of democracy".

Within this debate, former head-of-state Giuseppe Saragat, a Social Democrat, said that to approve of PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi was as "absurd" as to approve of Berlinguer. In the same breath, Saragat also criticized the Socialists for permitting the formation of a government from which the Social Democrats are excluded.

A leading member of the right-of-center Liberal Party, Deputy Secretary Antonio Patuelli, voiced the opinion that the present government had so far given no concrete answer to the problems facing the country. But the government parties said they see no alternative to the present arrangement.

Republican Party Secretary Giovanni Spadolini, for example, said there was "no real alternative in the short term..."

The DC's steering committee, which was in session yesterday, also rejected the PCI's moves to throw down the government and said that relations with the PSI are essential. The DC's secretary Flaminio Piccoli said that Berlinguer's speech was "backward" and confirmed his party's views that there is no alternative to the present coalition.

The steering committee finished its work by approving Piccoli's report with a majority. The supporters of former Premier Giulio Andreotti were absent and those backing former Secretary Benigni Zaccagnini abstained.

PORTUGAL TO JOIN EEC ON 1 JANUARY 1983

LD172059 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 17 Sep 80

[Text] The date for Portugal's accession to the EEC has been confirmed as 1 January 1983. This has been conveyed personally to the Portuguese secretary of state for European integration, Rui Almeida Mendes, by leaders of the EEC in Strasbourg. Portugal's accession to the EEC will not raise any problems, and there is a wish to help Portugal in the accession process, the chairman of the foreign relations committee of the European Parliament has stressed.

Unlike Spain's, Portugal's accession does not raise any problems in the two troubled sectors of the Community, namely, agriculture and fisheries, since Portugal's agricultural output is small, as is the case with its fishing fleet.

MARIO SOARES INTERVIEWED ON PREELECTION POLITICAL SCENE

LD181039 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 3 Sep 80 pp 7-8

[Dinis de Abreu and Simoes Ilharco interview with Portuguese Socialist Party [PS] Secretary General Mario Soares: "Hypothesis of Eanes Leading Left Is Ruled Out"--date and place of interview not given]

[Excerpts] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Are we to interpret the PS support for Eanes as "letting bygones be bygones," or did the PS support Eanes because it had no other valid alternative?

Mario Soares: In democracy there are always alternatives, and the PS had its own alternatives. It simply appeared to us that, judging from the analysis of the correlation of forces, Eanes was the person who could best symbolize at the present time the need to defend the democratic constitutional system, and, moreover, he is also the person who is in the best position to split the right and defeat it in the presidential elections. We supported General Eanes after a lengthy process of talks and after reaching a political understanding with him.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Don't you believe that this language, in asserting that Eanes will be able to defeat the right, contributes to an excessively leftist image of the president of the republic which will perhaps be detrimental to him?

Mario Soares: No. General Eanes clearly does not have a leftist image in the country, nor is he the right's candidate. He is the candidate of democracy and of the democratic system, as it emerged from the 1976 constitution. This stance, naturally adopted by General Eanes, must be clearly understood by the electorate, who for that reason will give him victory. I have no doubts that the social forces which desire the continuation of the democratic system are in the majority in our country. Despite the fact that Eanes is a military man, his candidacy has also highly civilian characteristics, and this, moreover, was one of the points of agreement reached.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Since we are discussing your future, do you accept the hypothesis of becoming prime minister again in the event of victory for the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS]?

Mario Soares: That depends mainly on the election results--a relative or absolute majority--and the political relations established within the framework of the FRS and outside it on the basis of those results.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But you don't rule out the hypothesis?

Mario Soares: I cannot rule out the hypothesis in any way, although, as I said, everything depends on the election results. I can tell you that I would not like the PS to govern in a minority again. I will tell you plainly that I would not like to become prime minister again in that event. But our aim is--as you know--that of securing a new majority to govern Portugal stably in the center and on the left.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: However, in order to secure an absolute majority you would have to rise 17 percent (from 27 percent to 44 percent), which seems too ambitious and even, according to some observers, an implausible hypothesis. Moreover Dr Alvaro Cunhal has already said that it was a deception of the electorate for the PS to assert that it will have an absolute majority. What is your opinion?

Mario Soares: It does not seem to me that it is implausible with respect to elections to have a specific aim, however ambitious, as a goal. It is clear that our aiming at a new majority is an ambitious plan. And it is understandable that Dr Alvaro Cunhal should be terrified by that hypothesis, because Dr Alvaro Cunhal's aim is for his party to be or become indispensable in Portuguese political life. Dr Sa Carneiro's aim is bipolarization--a bipolarization which would give the PCP every chance of becoming essential. That is, that there should be no alternative to a rightwing government such as that of Dr Sa Carneiro. But we are presenting ourselves very clearly to the electorate in these elections--seeking a new majority from which stable government can emerge, and with a president in political harmony with that new majority. That is why we support Ramalho Eanes. These three factors constitute a whole, and the electorate will have to make its choice: either it wants a center and leftwing government, which will be offered to it by the FRS, or it wants a rightwing government. And since the Socialist Democratic Party [PSD] has indisputably lost at the national and international level any aspirations to social democracy and betrayed its program, which is social democratic, it is clear that the FRS, with the Independent Social Democratic Association [ASDI], which comprises founders of the PSD, combined with the PS, the Union of the Left for Socialist Democracy [UEDS] and independent personalities, has all the prerequisites for being a majority alternative in this country. You can take it from me that there are many signs that the electorate is beginning to realize that this is the case.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Don't you deem it unrealistic to hope to increase the PS vote with the ASDI and UEDS, which have little electoral strength?

Mario Soares: In the last elections the UEDS represented 47,000 votes: sufficient to deprive the PS of three deputies and the United People's Alliance [APU] of one or two. If we had run together with the UEDS alone in 1979, the Democratic Alliance would perhaps not have held a majority today. The fact is that the ASDI's impact on the electorate has not yet been gauged, because this is the first time it has presented itself to the electorate with its social democratic platform. And it is indisputable that there is a large group of voters in the center which believes that the country should be governed by the center and the left and which regards bipolarization as highly dangerous, and so there will be a very appreciable shift of votes from the Democratic Alliance to the FRS.

The legislative elections must also be appraised within the context of the presidential elections, and the Democratic Alliance's candidate is restrictive with respect to the parties comprising it. As you know, he will not be supported by the Reformists. Many people located in the intermediate area between the Democratic Alliance and the FRS may also vote for the FRS this time, and, of course, all real social democrats will do so, as Prof Jorge Miranda remarked in Braga. But there are other reasons: In 1979 the Democratic Alliance was putting forward a majority blueprint of stability, and in 1980 it is no longer putting forward that blueprint but rather another blueprint of institutional warfare and a total of blockade of the institutions and of the democratic system, as [former PSD chairman] Riberio de Almeida's statements to your newspaper demonstrate.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: And if that blockade takes place, would the FRS be prepared to form a government?

Mario Soares: It cannot form a government. If by an eventuality which I deem absurd the Democratic Alliance secured a majority again, with Eanes reelected, the FRS would not form a government, because it would not go through in the Assembly of the Republic. This would mean that the only solution open to the president of the republic would be to dissolve parliament and call new elections. This country would enter into a situation of permanent instability, such as it has recently experienced, as a result of the Democratic Alliance's adventurist policy, with a considerable chance of the democratic institutions' not being able to survive. The electorate now realizes that this is extremely dangerous, and so it does not accept the capriciousness with which the Democratic Alliance--and in particular, Dr Sa Carneiro--is seeking to govern this country. I will also point out that I have never said that the FRS would not govern if General Soares Carneiro were president, because if I acted in this way I would be deeply antidemocratic, as the PSD chairman was in the contrary hypothesis.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Although not deeming a minority government desirable, you do not rule out that hypothesis. How would you make that government viable? Would you accept the APU's parliamentary support, without Communist participation in the government?

Mario Soares: I would not like to become involved in political crystal-gazing scenarios. However, I can tell you at the outset that I can see no prospect of any agreement between the FRS and the APU. Dr Sa Carneiro is a gambler in politics and is currently playing for all or nothing. And his immediate political future, which is in danger for many reasons, is closely linked with the election results. If he loses the majority, I do not believe that the PSD will display a suicidal temptation and exclude itself from the political and institutional process. On the other hand, [CDS chairman and deputy prime minister] Professor Freitas do Amaral, who would have been capable of becoming the leader of the Portuguese right, lost that chance of leadership because he senselessly allowed himself to become identified with and subordinate to Dr Sa Carneiro, despite the fact that the grassroots and viewpoints of the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS]dominate the coalition. In my opinion, Professor Freitas do Amaral, by not distancing himself as he should have done to safeguard his own political future, has ensured that in October, after the Democratic Alliance's more than likely defeat, well-placed competitors for the leadership of the CDS and of the Portuguese right will emerge.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: However, contradicting somewhat what you have said, you have already accepted the possibility of an agreement with the PSD in the event of a breakup of the Democratic Alliance....

Mario Soares: This hypothesis would only apply with a new PSD which would return to its program vocation and cease to be commanded by a fickle and capricious leader who, although possessing personal charisma, has allowed himself to be exploited (I would say almost naively) by the extreme rightwing forces which have dominated the entire Democratic Alliance process.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: As long as Dr Sa Carneiro is PSD leader, there will be no agreement with the PS. Is this what you mean?

Mario Soares: I would not put it like that, because I am not accustomed to excluding individuals. What I do say is that as long as Dr Sa Carneiro is what he has been as prime minister, there is not the slightest prospect of any agreement. But we have already witnessed many about-faces in his personality....

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In what way?

Mario Soares: In several ways. We have already seen times when he moved closer to the PS and others when he has moved away. We don't know what Dr Sa Carneiro's political future will be. I don't wish, as I have said, to place matters on a personal level. I separate the political assessments from the people and have always striven to maintain personal cordiality with all the political leaders, including Dr Sa Carneiro. But it seems to be that in view of the erosion which he was sustained and the delicate and unacceptable positions in which he has placed himself, in light of the grave and insufficiently explained accusations leveled against him, bearing in mind the fact that he has already lost the majority and has not accepted the request for an inquiry to clarify the accusations leveled against him and also taking into account other state problems which have arisen and are obvious, Dr Sa Carneiro should have the democratic integrity to resign, partly because his government gives no guarantees of impartiality for presiding over elections worthy of 25 April.

DIARIO DE NOTICAS: You mention the "socialist-communist conspiracy," and say that the right does not wish to distinguish the PS and the PCP, but the fact of the matter is that you are always voting on the side of the PCP....

Mario Soares: I have no complex with respect to the PS voting. We don't vote because we are on the side of the PCP or the PSD. We vote in accordance with the national interests and the way in which we view them in each specific instance. If that voting is supported by the PCP or by the right, that depends on the circumstances. Moreover, we took stock of the legislative session, and there were more joint votes with the PSD than with the PCP.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Are you certain about that?

Mario Soares: I am. At present I have no complexes with respect to the PCP. Otherwise we would be contriving to paralyze the PS voting. The PCP would vote in a certain way and the PS would ipso facto have to vote in another way. When the PCP puts forward demands which we deem just and legitimate, we vote with it, and we have no complex, just as we have no complex in voting with the PSD or the CDS.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you assess the high number of independents on the APU's lists? Do you believe that we are confronted with a new strategy on the part of the PCP?

Mario Soares: In the first place these "independents" are not independents but fellow travelers and people who support the PCP. Second, the PCP's strategy is always the same, because Dr Alvaro Cunhal is a man who has great tactical flexibility yet always maintains the same strategic rigidity. The PCP--let nobody deceive himself--always remains the same party, having changed nothing in essentials and being, moreover, incapable of change with respect to its strict loyalty to the USSR. The events in Afghanistan and Poland serve to demonstrate this.

FREITAS DO AMARAL INTERVIEWED ON ALLIANCE WITH PS

LD181055 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Sep 80 pp 7-8

[Simeos Ilharco interview with Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] Chairman Diogo Freitas do Amaral: "Democratic Alliance Will Not Form Government Alliances with Socialist Party [PS]--date and place of interview not specified]

[Excerpt] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you endorse [former PSD chairman] Dr Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida's assertion that the Democratic Alliance will not form a government if President Eanes is reelected?

Freitas do Amaral: Sa Carneiro stated that he would not agree to be prime minister of a Democratic Alliance government under General Eanes. And there was a statement by myself that I would not accept any government post in that event. So far, the Democratic Alliance, as such, has made no official pronouncement concerning the matter about which Dr Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida expressed that personal viewpoint. I can tell you--also on a personal basis--that my opinion is that the Democratic Alliance, if it holds a parliamentary majority, as we hope, should not shun the responsibilities which, as such, will rest with it.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: So you accept the hypothesis of the Democratic Alliance, if it is in the majority, governing under the current president of the republic in the event of General Eanes' being reelected?

Freitas do Amaral: I do not accept the hypothesis of General Eanes' winning, but under those circumstances the Democratic Alliance will have to accept the responsibilities which rest with it through the electorate's decision, although knowing that Dr Sa Carneiro and I myself will not be in government. In that event we will probably be in parliament, where the revision of the constitution will be debated and where we will lead the political struggle, which will then be directed not only against the parliamentary opposition but also against the parliamentary opposition but also against the president of the republic.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: You will struggle against the president of the republic in parliament while the Democratic Alliance is in the government?

Freitas do Amaral: As far as I am concerned, I believe that if General Eanes were elected, being, as he is, a candidate of the Socialists and Communists, the Democratic Alliance would have to oppose him in everything representing an attempt to implement the pledges made by him to the Socialists and the Communists--his constituency.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Will the Democratic Alliance govern only if it holds an absolute majority, or will it accept the hypothesis of governing in a minority?

Freitas do Amaral: This matter has been fully clarified. This year, just as last year, the Democratic Alliance will only agree to form a government if it holds an absolute majority. If it does not, it will be in opposition. It will continue as the Democratic Alliance, but in opposition.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: And if nobody holds an absolute majority? What solution do you advocate? Are you prepared to reach some agreement with the PS?

Freitas do Amaral: I believe that there should be no government agreement between the Democratic Alliance and the PS. There could possibly be procedural agreements--for instance, with respect to the revision of the constitution--but not government alliances. If the Democratic Alliance does not hold a majority, this means that the majority belongs arithmetically to the Republican and Socialist Front and the Communist Party. It will be in that area that a solution for the formation of the government will have to be found.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: So, ruling out my possibility of an agreement between the Democratic Alliance and the PS, let us assume that the PS reached an agreement with the Social Democratic Party [PSD] in isolation, as a party. What would the attitude of the CDS be? Would that mean the end of the Democratic Alliance?

Freitas do Amaral: That will not happen. But if there were absurdly any agreement between one of the Alliance parties and third parties, that would mean the end of the Democratic Alliance itself.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Judging from the statements, some of them contradictory, which the Democratic Alliance makes, is there not an excessive number of spokesmen in the Democratic Alliance?

Freitas do Amaral: No. When the Democratic Alliance has not yet adopted a final and official stance on a specific matter, everybody within the Democratic Alliance can express personal opinions on the problem. We are in a democracy, aren't we?

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Don't you believe that you are driving the PS away from the democratic area in excluding the PS from any government agreement?

Freitas do Amaral: No. Democracy would be faring badly if only the area of the government were regarded as the democratic area. The area of government is as democratic as that of the opposition; democracy is served as much in the government as in the opposition. We believe that there should be no government agreement with the PS, because the political blueprints which the Democratic Alliance and the PS embody and personify are different and very difficult to reconcile. A government of that kind would be a government with a very weak capacity for decisionmaking, because of the constant ideological debate and internal party confrontation to which it would give rise. We ourselves in the CDS realize what this means, because we were with the PS in the government for 6 months; it was a negative and frustrating experience because the PS did not accept agreements in which the CDS opinions would be properly taken into account. On the contrary, the PS only concerned itself with its own interests as a party and with the secret agreements which it maintained simultaneously with the Communist Party. So it did not have the ability to reach agreement with its coalition partner. What happened at that time between the PS and the CDS would be repeated in the same way now between the PS and the Democratic Alliance. When General Eanes advocates a PS-PSD government--he who knows so well what happened in the PS-CDS government--he is basically advocating a government of agreement with the PCP.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you reconcile the fact that the Democratic Alliance complains that the PS has no language of its own, has no independence and is dragged behind the Communist Party and, on the other hand, excludes the PS from any government agreement. Isn't there a contradiction here?

Freitas do Amaral: Clearly not. In the first place because, as I said, democracy is served as much in the government as in the opposition, and there is no obligation for a democratic majority to bring all the other democratic parties in the country into the government. If that were the case, the SPD in the FRG would be obliged to bring the Christian Democrats into the government, the Conservative Party in Britain would be obliged to bring the Labor Party into the government, and that would destroy the existence of opposition and the entire machinery of the alternative on which democracy is based. On the contrary, I believe that it is necessary and very advantageous for there to be alternative democratic force in opposition at the same time as a democratic force in the government. This is essential to democracy, because it is only in this way that you ensure that the dissatisfactions which perhaps arise with respect to the government of the day are channeled into an alternative force which is democratic, in the democratic opposition, and not into undemocratic or extraparliamentary forces. What would be desirable would be for the PS, as the only valid force of the democratic opposition--I do not regard the Communist Party as a democratic party--to have its own line, to have strategic and tactical independence, delimit itself clearly from the Communist Party and achieve the perspicacity, the power of initiative and such good judgment in its policies that the Communist Party would be dragged behind the PS. But the fact is that the reverse is the case. The PS has no imagination, no initiative and no ability to determine a strategy and to implement it brilliantly and efficiently, so that it is always towed behind the initiatives taken by the Communist Party. This is bad; it is bad for democracy and bad for the PS, as will be confirmed in the coming elections.

EAST, WEST DISAGREE ON CSCE AGENDA

LD181438 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] It seems that the preparatory meeting for the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe is livening up at last--to such an extent that the delegates spent the whole of this morning in the conference room without taking the usual break.

The subject which has come under discussion--and which will certainly be the central issue of the next few days--is the comparison between the Spanish proposal and that which Hungary submitted yesterday afternoon. Apparently they are almost identical. The difference lies in the fact that the Spanish, supported by the majority of the Western and neutral countries, divide the conference in two parts as was agreed in Belgrade, while the Hungarian proposal wants it all to be joined.

The reason is really that the Western countries want the fulfilment of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and the Belgrade document to be studied in the first part, leaving the new proposals drawn up by the experts on the basis of the previous conferences for the second part--a fact which will give rise to discussion at the principal Madrid conference of a subject which the Eastern bloc wants to avoid.

Should the Hungarian proposal be adopted, the study of the actions carried out by the participants in the past would be contested along with the rest of the other questions. The Soviet delegate, who spoke at the end of the session, supported the statements by Czechoslovakia and Poland in yesterday's session, and, naturally, agrees with the Hungarian delegation's proposal.

The work of the preparatory meeting continues this afternoon and is showing signs of lasting practically until the principal meeting in November.

KEKKONEN COMMENTS ON PLANS FOR U.S. WEAPONS IN NORWAY

LD151232 Helsinki International Service in English 0930 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] President Urho Kekkonen has said he is convinced that the security policy balance in the north will remain and that the plans in Norway to store U.S. weapons will not be able to change the situation. In a statement to Norwegian journalists President Kekkonen said that he has always appreciated the calmness and the sense of responsibility shown by Norway in her policy concerning bases and in her attitude towards nuclear weapons. The Finnish president said that he trusted this policy will hold in the future as well. (Patrick Humphreys) reports:

Stable security policy is characteristic of Nordic conditions, the president said. This has been promoted by close cooperation between the countries in all fields, he continued and stressed his firm conviction that the maintenance of the traditional Nordic security policy situation will also remain in the interests of all sides in the future. President Kekkonen told the Norwegian press of his deep concern over the present international situation. This prevailing crisis of confidence could lead to decisions that would commit the world to an arms race for many years ahead, he said. Nonetheless, the pursuit in Europe of cooperation has brought significant results in recent years, the Finnish president observed, and he expressed the hope that the followup conference of the CSCE, beginning in Madrid in November, would indicate the existence of a real desire for detente.

FOREIGN MINISTER VAYRYNEN COMMENTS ON CSCE ISSUES

LD181518 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1350 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] Stockholm, 18 Sep (TANJUG)--In an interview to the TANJUG correspondent, Finnish Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen said, in answer to several questions on the Madrid session of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe CSCE, that Finland considers as important and useful cooperation within the group of Europe's neutral and non-aligned countries. These countries have made valuable contributions to negotiations at the CSCE sessions, initiating compromises.

Referring to expectations from the Madrid session, the Finnish foreign minister underlined the importance of trying to ensure the success of detente, particularly in Europe. This should not lessen the need for making similar efforts at the global level as well, he said.

Foreign Minister Vayrynen said that Finland expects the CSCE Madrid session to attain general understanding on the need for achieving results in the field of military security. He added that the initiatives and proposals on disarmament in Europe are also worthy of notice. A new approach is necessary for stimulating discussions on disarmament and control at the military level in Europe. In this context, Minister Vayrynen cited Finland's initiative on a European disarmament programme. The CSCE [word inistinct] session is providing the first opportunity for discussing all the initiatives at a multi-lateral forum. Vayrynen said that Finland would greet an agreement on holding the CSCE Madrid session at the level of foreign ministers.

PREMIER NORDLI REPLIES TO BREZHNEV ON ARMS TALKS

[Text] It is a source of deep satisfaction for the government that the Soviet Union is prepared to begin negotiations with the United States on the limitation of nuclear arms in Europe, Prime Minister Odvar Nordli wrote in his reply to Leonid Brezhnev. It is important that negotiations which make it possible to create increased security at the lowest possible level are started as soon as possible, Nordli stressed.

Prime Minister Odvar Nordli replied yesterday to the letter of 21 August from Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev, in which Brezhnev stated his view on the importance of starting negotiations on the limitation of nuclear missiles on the European continent. In his reply the prime minister refers to his letter to Brezhnev of 21 November 1979 in which he expressed his satisfaction that the Soviet Union was willing to discuss limiting both intercontinental and other nuclear arms. Nordli writes that the Norwegian Government still attaches considerable importance to such negotiations, that the government hopes that they can be started as soon as possible and that the negotiations can lead to results which contribute to achieving a military balance at the lowest possible level.

Nordli writes further that it is a source of deep satisfaction for the government that the Soviet Union, as Brezhnev's letter seems to indicate, is now prepared to begin negotiations with the United States on nuclear arms limitation in Europe. Nordli points out that both the United States and the other NATO nations have reacted positively to this announcement by the Soviet Union. We now expect that negotiations on these questions will begin in the near future, Nordli writes.

Prime Minister Nordli concludes his letter to President Brezhnev by saying that he agrees that we must not let time run out in this or other disarmament questions. For this reason it is important that we start negotiations that will make possible the creation of greater security at the lowest possible level as soon as possible. Both the government and the Norwegian people are deeply concerned about the dangers of continued nuclear rearmament and they support all real efforts to halt the worrying trend we now see, Nordli's reply to Brezhenv says.

FOREIGN MINISTER FRYDENLUND COMMENTS ON CSCE PLANS

AU171418 Belgrade BORBA in Serbo-Croatian 12 Sep 80 p 8

[Aleksandar Lebl report on BORBA exclusive interview with Knut Frydenlund, Norway's minister of foreign affairs, in Oslo; date not given]

[Text] Oslo, 11 Sept--"Continuation of the relaxation of tension is the basic goal of Norwegian foreign policy and we hope that the Madrid meeting of the CSCE participant countries will provide a solid basis for it. In this respect we follow the same line as Yugoslavia," Knut Frydenlund, Norway's minister of foreign affairs, said in his exclusive interview with BORBA.

Answering a question on what he expects from the Madrid meeting, Minister Frydenlund said:

"Our attitude toward the meeting is determined by our general philosophy on the importance of detente and the continuation of the process of relaxation of tension. We know that deteriorations occur in that process from time to time. However, considered from the viewpoint of a longer period of say 10 or 15 years, in Europe's history, great results have been achieved because of the relaxation of tension."

Balanced Approach

"Europe today is different from what it was 15 years ago. If it is possible for this process to continue, Europe in 15 years hence will be different from what it is today. For this reason we very resolutely support the relaxation of tension. The Madrid meeting is a very important instrument in the negotiations on this process. We clearly realize that the atmosphere on the eve and at the beginning of the meeting is not the best," Knut Frydenlund continued. "The international situation is tense. However, it is our view that the relaxation of tension must be given a new stimulus in a way in which all participant countries will spare no efforts to achieve specific results at the meeting.

"We have always advocated a balanced approach to the Helsinki Final Act and all its 'baskets', which will also be our attitude at this meeting. Nevertheless, we believe that if the meeting decides that the measures for strengthening confidence must be expanded and that they must be considered of vital importance this will be especially important for Europe's future. We consider that to be one of the principal goals of the meeting. It would be good if the Madrid meeting adopted a decision on convening the European conference on arms control and disarmament," the Norwegian minister of foreign affairs further said, "and also considered various proposals made in this respect in recent years. We believe that the binding measures for strengthening confidence would be a very important first stage of such a conference."

Answering in this connection an additional question whether, in view of the negotiations on the same topic held in Vienna and Geneva, such a conference would not be a multiplication of the bodies concerning themselves with disarmament, Minister Frydenlund said that that really would amount to a multiplication of the forums concerned but that at the same time it would only be a division of labor. "Unlike the Vienna negotiations, the European conference on disarmament would require the participation of all signatory countries of the Helsinki Final Act and would be primarily devoted to measures for strengthening confidence. And it must be hoped that consequently the negotiations between the United States and the USSR on reducing the forces in Europe would also be given a new stimulus. I am not bothered by the multitude of forums," Knut Frydenlund said, "and many of the aforementioned elements could be integrated in the second stage of the European conference on disarmament."

The next question concerned the level of the Madrid meeting. In his reply to it Knut Frydenlund said that, in Norway's view, the Madrid meeting should be held at the ministerial level and that in that connection it would be necessary to determine whether the ministers should participate in the opening stage of the meeting, in the course of its work or in the meeting's concluding stage.

"In any event the importance of the meeting should be enhanced by the presence of ministers of foreign affairs. In the same way Norway also attaches great importance to ensuring the continuity of the process initiated in Helsinki. It is precisely the long-term aspects of that process that are of decisive importance. To preserve that process, it is very important to insure that every meeting will determine the time and place of the next meeting in order to emphasize that what is involved is something that is constantly in progress."

Indivisible Concept

Minister Frydenlund also answered a question on what Norway understands under the term of detente, in view of the fact that detente does not mean the same thing to all countries. In his opinion, detente is an indivisible concept.

"But it is necessary to accept the fact that there are various situations and ways. There is no doubt that events outside Europe affect detente in Europe. What is important is to insure that these events will not destroy the chances and prospects of detente in Europe.

"For instance, Afghanistan should not halt detente in Europe but instead should provide an encouragement toward the adoption of measures for strengthening confidence."

In the opinion of the Norwegian minister of foreign affairs, the Madrid meeting should devote appropriate attention to the second, that is, the economic basket. As a small country, Norway especially believes that better conditions for small and medium-size firms should be created in international trade. Quite a great deal has been accomplished in Europe in economic relations, due credit of which must be given to both states and firms. The economic integration now in progress in Europe is the most solid basis for bringing the two parts of Europe closer to one another, he believes.

Summing up, Knut Frydenlund pointed out that during the preparations [for the Madrid meeting] Norway devoted special attention to the measures for strengthening confidence and expressed his conviction that the Madrid meeting can and must achieve specific results precisely in this sphere.

"During the preparations very good contacts were established with Yugoslavia. Continuation of the relaxation of tension is the basic goal of Norwegian foreign policy and in this respect it follows the same line as Yugoslav foreign policy. We hope that the Madrid meeting will provide a solid basis for that," Knut Frydenlund concluded.

LABOR UNION LEADER COMMENTS ON VISIT TO POLAND

[Text] "The new free trade unions in Poland are very interested in contacts and collaboration with colleagues in our part of the world. But aid from our side must be given circumspectly, so that it does not create problems for those who receive it," Socialist Left Party trade union leader Lasse Jahnsen said, when he returned from a visit to Poland at the head of a Norwegian trade union delegation. The delegation, which was sent after a Socialist Left Party initiative, met Lech Walesa and a number of the other leaders of Poland's free workers movement.

"The free trade union movement which is now being organized is concerned that help and aid are given in such a way that the authorities are given no grounds for suspicion. Therefore such support or contacts ought not to be implemented centrally; they should be based on direct cooperation between individual Norwegian and Polish concerns or groups, from association to association, from branch to branch between the two countries," Lasse Jahnsen said. "They are not at all interested in money. 'We have enough money,' they said. This is because they have received a great deal of economic contributions from a sympathetic population. They have greater need of various types of materials. They are especially interested in studying organizational forms and measures in the Norwegian trade union movement."

"We were given an overwhelming reception by our Polish trade union comrades, who are obviously interested in Scandinavia," Jahnsen said. "They are convinced that the movement that is now happening among Polish workers will not be able to be stopped. They are sure that the official trade union federation is disintegrating and that the free trade union will quickly become the country's dominant trade union movement."

"The workers look at the country's new leader Stanislaw Kania with great distrust. He is the Soviet Union's man through and through, they say. The distrust of those in power also has an effect on the strong position of the Catholic Church. Many of the people whom we met are deeply religious Catholics, but there were also examples of atheists who went to church as a way of demonstrating their oppositions to the regime," Jahnsen said.

GALLUP POLL INDICATES DROP IN GOVERNMENT POPULARITY

LD181311 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 18 Sep 80 p 11

[Text] Mrs Thatcher ended her first 500 days with the Conservative Party 9-1/2 percent behind Labour, compared with the seven percent advantage she began with after the election, according to the latest Gallup Poll conducted exclusively for THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mrs Thatcher's personal popularity, too, has suffered, and the recent announcement of unemployment topping the two million mark is undoubtedly the main reason for Labour's lead almost doubling from 5-1/2 percent to 9-1/2 percent in a month.

Party support shown on the latest study was:

	Today	Aug	July	June
Cons.	35-1/2	38-1/2	40	40-1/2
Labour	45	44	43-1/2	45
Liberal	16-1/2	14-1/2	14	11-1/2
Other	3	3	2-1/2	3

The gap of 9-1/2 percent between the two main parties represents a swing of around eight percent to Labour since the general election.

A measure of the public's growing concern with unemployment is that two in three (64 percent) believe it to be the most urgent problem facing the country at the present time. In June only 29 percent mentioned it as the country's top problem.

It should be no surprise, therefore, that the public think the government should give greater attention to unemployment (59 percent) than to inflation (33 percent)--the reverse of the government's stated priority.

When those interviewed were shown a list of 10 possible causes of the present unemployment problem, the world recession (46 percent) and foreign competition (43 percent) almost tied as the most often chosen reasons. These are closely followed by unjustified wage increases (37 percent) and government policies (34 percent).

A question on the main single cause, however, narrows the blame to the world recession (21 percent) and government policies (18 percent).

Despite Mrs Thatcher's claims that her policies are the right ones, a majority (62 percent) of the general public believe they should be changed in some way. On the other hand, 33 percent think the government should continue with their present policy. While 70 percent of Conservatives support the continuance of their party's economic policies, 26 percent think it is now time for a change.

With the growing number of unemployed, the popularity of Mrs Thatcher and her government has reached the lowest point since the election.

The survey was based on a nationally representative quota sample of 1,032 electors in over 100 districts between Sept. 10-15. The "don't knows" excluded from the voting figures amounted to 6-1/2 percent, and the main findings in detail from other questions were:

FOREIGN MINISTER MITSOTAKIS RETURNS FROM BULGARIA

AT181335 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] This morning Foreign Minister Mitsotakis returned to Athens from Sofia. Mitsotakis had paid a friendly visit to the Bulgarian capital. Yesterday Mitsotakis was received by Bulgarian Chairman Zhivkov. In addition, the foreign minister and the members of the Greek delegation held talks with Deputy Chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers Lukanov, Foreign Minister Mladenov and Minister for Power Supply Todoriev.

Among other things, Mitsotakis discussed with the Bulgarian officials the details of the official visit that President of the Republic Karamanlis will pay to Sofia on 12 October. The Bulgarian news agency reported that Mitsotakis' talks with the Bulgarian officials were held in a friendly, cordial atmosphere and covered bilateral and international issues. MITSOTAKIS REAFFIRMS COMMITMENT TO WESTERN ALLIANCES

LD181155 Madrid ABC in Spanish 12 Sep 80 p 15

[Antonio Alferez interview in Athens with Greek Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis: "Greece Has No Neutralist Temptations"; date not given]

[Excerpts] Athens--"I can assure you that the Greek Government does not feel the slightest neutralist, still less Third World temptation." This emphatic statement might be the best summary of Greek foreign policy as outlined to ABC's special correspondent by Greek Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis.

Our conversation began with Greece's international identity, which has so often been sought from a negative viewpoint ("the Greeks are Balkans but not Slavs; Orientals but not Muslims; Westerners but geographically in the East"). In the opinion of Athens' diplomatic chief, Greece's role is quite clear:

"We have joined the EEC and as of 1 January next year we will be the 10th full member of the Community. Our foreign policy will therefore be that of an EEC member country, without forgetting our special characteristics stemming from our geographical position, our history and our special relations (I am talking about the Arab world). What I can say is that on the whole the Greeks will not heed Third World theses, because they know that our policy centered on the West is the one most favorable to our interests."

The topic of Spain and the Common Market arose and we discussed the member countries' various stances on Spain's entry, France's "stubbornness" and Italy's "understanding." Mitsotakis, who will attend the next EEC Council of Ministers session as an observer, said the following:

"We will be closer to Italy's stance than to France's. Our problems were greater and it was due to this 'volume factor' that our negotiations progressed well. Now the problems and the situation are more difficult, but Greece will maintain a definitely positive attitude to Spain when in January we become the Community's 10th member country. Specifically, we aspire to achieving a certain balance within the EEC between the Northern and Mediterranean countries."

Next Minister Mitsotakis explained the "special characteristics" of Greek foreign policy:

"We have managed to establish good relations with the Balkan countries, which constitutes a positive element not only for us but for the cause of peace in general. We maintain a traditional friendship with the Arab countries. In this connection I must say that Greece and Spain were the only countries to have 'discovered' the Arab world before 1973. In our assembly there is a parliamentary group which deals exclusively with intensifying and improving relations with the Arab world, to which we send almost one-fourth of our exports. As for establishing full diplomatic relations with Israel, obviously in the near future we will have to reach a positive decision, but not because this is a requirement of our entry into the EEC."

[Alferez] Greece takes care of its rearguard (the Balkan countries) and has begun a very fruitful economic penetration to the south (the Arab world), but it is not forgetting its twofold links with the West--through the Common Market and NATO. There are no problems with regard to the EEC. Not so with NATO: In 1974 then Prime Minister Karamanlis opted for taking the country out of the alliance's military structure in view of its passive response to the brutal Turkish attack on Cyprus. Years later Karamanlis sought a return to the Allied military structure, but then these aims clashed with Turkey's demands regarding air and naval control of the Aegean.

[Mitsotakis] I am optimistic about Greece's return to the NATO military structure. We like the idea of belonging to a multilateral alliance and we believe that it is in this framework that we must place our military cooperation with the United States. I said a few days ago that unless this problem is resolved by the end of the year the U.S. bases on Greek territory will have to be closed.

[Alferez] The Greek diplomat who next Monday will be sitting at a table opposite his Turkish counterpart is (Byron) Theodhoropoulos, who explained to me Greece's attitude to this important meeting:

"It will be the sixth round of negotiations between our governments at this technical level. We understand that our interlocutor is in a weak position (the Turkish problems of high inflation, terrorism and political instability), which is reflected in difficulties in negotiations. This dispute over the Aegean has been going on for 6 years now. Ankara is seeking joint control [condominio] both of the continental shelf and of the air space, and we do not agree with this. Since we have opposite stances, we are in favor of mediation by any competent international tribunal, though the Turks systematically oppose this. This refusal to accept a solution from an international tribunal is prompting a number of suspicions among the Greeks concerning Turkey's intentions and aims."

My final question to Secretary Theodhoropoulos concerned NATO. Greece left the military structure when Karamanlis reacted to popular dissatisfaction with the alliance following events in Cyprus.

[Theodhoropoulos] We believe that the best solution to Greece's defense is membership in the Atlantic alliance. Obviously there is a degree of risk in such a move, but a good policy sometimes demands the courage to take risks, and this is the decision taken by Karamanlis and now by Prime Minister Rallis' government.

VOTCP CLAIMS U.S. PLANNED, KNEW ABOUT COUP IN ADVANCE

TA181213 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Station Commentary]

[Text] In reply to a question at a new conference [held on 16 September] the head of the junta, Evren, said that the United States was not informed about the coup. As proof, Evren added that even the wives and the children [of the military leaders] were not informed about the coup. It is necessary to dwell upon this reply, which was received with amazement by hundreds of journalists. There are innumerable pieces of evidence that show that the United States was informed in advance about the 12 September coup. For example, what was Air Force Commander Sahinkaya, one of the junta members, doing in Washington prior to the coup? The junta refrains from making any statement on the issue. Did Sahinkaya bring the U.S. coup plan with him on his return to Turkey on 11 September? The junta remains silent in the face of this question as well.

Apart from all this, the U.S. State Department was the first to report the coup to the world. The junta only confirmed this report. Then they began the radio broadcasts. While all imperialist press organs reported without reservations that the Pentagon was informed in advance about the coup, the junta, through miserable efforts, is trying to conceal the U.S. stain on its forehead. Evren insists on concealing other facts known by all. For example, all imperialist radios and dailies have announced that Turgut Ozal has been appointed to the highest civilian position and that there is a great probability that he will be prime minister. However, the head of the junta has not made a single statement on the issue. Imperialist circles are deciding on who will be prime minister in Turkey and who will take care of the economy. This is very clear. The junta is appointed by the Pentagon and the government by the IMF and the World Bank. Evren is trying to conceal this fact.

What is the evidence Evren presents to prove that the United States was not informed in advance about the coup? He has a single piece of evidence. He claims the United States was not informed because even the wives and children of the coupists were not informed about it. This is the evidence he proposes to give. The fact that the wife of Evren Pasha was not informed about the coup proves that the United States was not informed either. Evren has his reasons for talking such nonsense. He is reading the demagogic texts prepared by CIA experts. However, he is exposed in the face of unexpected question. It is no coincidence that Evren replied nervously to the question "was America informed about the coup?" Evren was one of the last persons to learn that the coup would be on 12 September. Those who decided on how and when the coup would be staged and to what end were U.S. generals and the secretary general of the junta, Gen Saltik, and his followers. While stating that his wife and his children were not informed about the coup, Evren wanted to say that he was one of the last to be informed on the issue. That is why he was replying nervously to questions along this line.

An Italian daily reported that the strife between pro-NATO and anti-NATO elements within the Turkish Armed Forces is continuing. This is true. The pro-American and pro-NATO junta is scared of the people and the patriotic forces within the armed forces. They are, therefore, constantly lying and, at times, exert ridiculous and nonsensical efforts to conceal the stain of pro-Americanism on their forehead.

Junta generals, you are frightened to admit the fact that the United States was informed in advance about the coup, while the United States itself announced that it was informed. Be sincere. Leave aside the literature on the nation and the motherland and admit that you staged the coup with the United States against the Turkish people, our people. This is the truth.

BELGIAN GOVERNMENT ACCEPTS CRUISE MISSILES INSTALLATION

NC191745 Paris AFP in English 1742 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Brussels, 19 Sep (AFP)--The Belgian Government today accepted the installation of cruise missiles on its territory in conformity with a decision of its allies last December, Premier Wilfried Martens said today after a cabinet meeting.

While awaiting the results of U.S.-Soviet negotiations on controls on missile forces in Europe, Mr. Martens said, Belgium would meet the obligations assigned to it by its North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) allies.

The Belgian Government's decision provisionally ends an internal dispute over the installation of 48 U.S. cruise missiles in Belgium. Deployment of the weapons is scheduled to begin in 1983.

Prime Minister Martens Interview

LD191828 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] As a result of a two-stage cabinet meeting, which has in fact allowed the Flemish Socialists to consult their bureau this afternoon, a compromise, a third way, as Wilfried Martens has said, was finally worked out in connection with the deployment in Belgium of the NATO missiles. Prime Minister Wilfried Martens is talking to (Marine Vansowegan):

[Begin recording] [Martens] What we have is a third way. The issue is not to know at which moment the government will decide. We have (?established) the manner in which to proceed and we have defined a position or rather the line along which the Belgian Government will adopt its position. As a result, the minister of foreign affairs can now say clearly in his contacts with our partners or with other countries what the position of the Belgian Government is.

We have accepted in essence three theses: First, that there must be negotiations. We have always stressed the negotiation aspect in the two-part collective decision of NATO of 12 December 1979. These negotiations will probably start in October. We have therefore foreseen in this case two possibilities--that the negotiations bring either total or partial results--and Belgium will execute the part that falls to her as a result of these negotiations. If the results are total, there will not be any installations at all and the Russians will therefore destroy their SS-20's.

If the results are not total, but only partial, then: Here it is, one will install on both sides a certain number of missiles, but in a controlled and limited manner. Belgium will install its number but [interviewer interrupts]

[Question] (?Determined on principle)?

[Answer] No, in this case the part that has been agreed, for example, one-half or one-third. This will depend on the result of negotiations.

The second [as heard] possibility is that there is no result from these negotiations, and in this case--and this is very important--we have accepted today that Belgium will take in solidarity with its allies all the measures that have been agreed upon within NATO. But, and I must say this, too, before taking steps within NATO, the government itself will evaluate the situation at that moment.

[Question] This means, in short, that Belgium reserves a certain right to evaluation after the negotiations conducted between East and West.

[Answer] Yes. In case of a break-off or in case of no result, we shall show solidarity with our NATO allies, but we are not robots within NATO and the government will itself evaluate the situation before participating in the collective decision of NATO, according to the rules of collective decisionmaking within NATO. But what is important is that we shall be in the platform [interviewer interrupts]

[Question] Leading or bringing up the rear?

[Answer] In the platoon. We shall be in the platoon of our NATO partners. We shall no longer be detached, as now, and we shall thus be in solidarity. We shall accept the measures which will be decided in solidarity.

[Question] Showing solidarity--does this mean that the Belgian Government does not align its position in any way with that of the Dutch Government?

[Answer] No, I think that it must be said now quite clearly that the attitude of the Belgian Government is quite different--after the modifications that were made today--than the position of the Netherlands Government.

[Question] Even if the Dutch Government were to propose to you negotiating a joint position, you could not accept it after the political position adopted here.

[Answer] No. The Dutch Government has said that there should be participation in the collective decision on modernization, and--but has said that as far as installation is concerned--I am still talking about the Government of the Netherlands--they will not make any decision before 31 December 1981. [end recording]

GENSCHER ON PLANNED UN TALKS WITH MUSKIE, GROMYKO

LD211304 Hamburg DPA in German 1206 GMT 21 Sep 80

NC201257 Paris AFP in English 1244 GMT 20 Sep 80

RAILWAYS STRIKE OCCUPIES GOVERNMENT, ALLIED ATTENTION

LD191422 Hamburg DPA in German 1317 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Berlin, (DPA)--The continuing strike of West Berlin employees of the GDR Reichsbahn occupied the attention of the Federal Government, the three Western allies and the Berlin Senat. In Bonn the head of the chancellor's office, Manfred Schueler, summoned representatives of the relevant federal ministries together for talks on the situation. Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald declined to comment on the strike, since it is a question of a "wage dispute." A spokesman for the three Western allies said that they are being briefed constantly on the situation by the Senat. So far, however, the situation has not been dramatic. There is no cause to make a statement of principle on it nor to intervene. It is a strike such as has occurred elsewhere. The situation would be different if the allied service trains were impeded, but so far this has not happened.

Strikers, Police Clash

LD200926 Hamburg DPA in German 0841 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Berlin, 20 Sep (DPA)--There were further clashes between striking employees of the GDR Reichsbahn and railway police this morning. A spokesman for the strike leaders reported that Reichsbahn police stormed a Spandau signal box affected by the strike and drove the strikers out of the building. The spokesman said that there had been no physical violence as the strikers only offered passive resistance.

Police Free Railway Official

[Summary] Berlin, 20 Sep (DPA)--The West Berlin police this morning intervened in the strike of West Berlin employees of the GDR Reichsbahn by freeing a senior official of a Spandau signal box who had been locked up by strikers.

A strike committee spokesman told journalists that the police had cleared the signal box, which was occupied by striking railway workers. The West Berlin police acted in response to a senior official's insistence on his rights as the occupier of the premises. The spokesman condemned the police intervention. He said that it had strengthened the position of the GDR Reichsbahn management and weakened that of the strikers.

Traffic to Federal Territory Threatened

LD202134 Hamburg DPA in German 2045 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Text] West Berlin, 20 Sep (DPA)--Strikers of the West Berlin [words indistinct] GDR Reichsbahn this evening threatened to paralyze long-distance passenger traffic to federal territory. [sentence indistinct] The strike committee spokesman said that if the strikers managed to hold the signal box (?at Zoo Station) the intention was to interrupt long-distance passenger traffic to federal territory. The trains would, however, be allowed far enough into Zoo Station for the passengers to alight. The strikers were also trying to occupy the second signal box at Zoo Station from which traffic from the West to Berlin is regulated.

Strike Escalates

[Text] West Berlin, 20 Sep (DPA)--The strike by the West Berlin staff of the GDR Reichsbahn escalated (?dramatically) this evening. Seven members of the GDR railway police forced their way into the signal box at Zoo Station, which had been occupied at 2100 by eight railwaymen actively involved in the strike. Half an hour after the occupation rail traffic was interrupted. Representatives of the (?West Berlin) Senat and of the allied protecting powers discussed the situation late this evening.

After the occupation of the signal box, its chief declared solidarity with the strikers. Out of the windows the strikers called for the help of the (?West) Berlin police officers from the station police office who urged the GDR railway police to leave the signal box which the latter did at 2215. At the moment West Berlin policemen are in front of the signal box, and facing them are the GDR railway police. An express train [words indistinct] (?is standing) in the station. The passengers are being told over loudspeakers that rail traffic to the Federal Republic is delayed indefinitely. The head of the police station at Zoo Station pointed out that the allies could order the West Berlin police to clear (?the signal box) of the strikers in order to put an end to the interruption of traffic.

Allies, Senat, Police Consult

[Excerpts] Berlin, 20 Sep (DPA)--A train with 100 passengers bound for Munich has been stuck in West Berlin's Zoo Station since 2130. The train cannot leave the station after striking West Berlin staff of the GDR Reichsbahn on Saturday evening occupied a signal box which regulates rail traffic to and from West Berlin. After the occupation, rail traffic at the station was paralyzed. Trains from Warsaw and [name indistinct] traveling on to Paris and Ostend have not arrived at the station. All trains from federal territory have, however, been able to reach the station.

Shortly before midnight a British security officer--Zoo Station lies in the British sector--familiarized himself with the situation. He simply confirmed that discussions have begun between the allies, the Senat and the police authorities. At the station strikers declared that they saw bringing long-distance passenger traffic to and from Berlin to a standstill as a last chance of getting the allies to intervene.

Train Service Disrupted

[Excertps] Hamburg, 21 Sep (DPA)--Intra-German rail traffic between FRG territory and West Berlin, interrupted since Sunday night by virtue of the striking West Berlin staff of the GDR state railways, is to recommence shortly at a reduced level. The federal railways and (?GDR state railways) agreed this morning to decide in each individual case whether a scheduled train would be allowed to leave or not. An FRG railway spokesman told DPA in reply to an enquiry that the Frankfurt/Main-West Berlin express--scheduled departure at 0651, arrival at 1410 at Zoo Station--was the first train to be accepted by the (GDR) state railways. Since Sunday night several trains either have not been accepted by the GDR state railways at the GDR border or have been prevented from leaving West Berlin for the Federal Republic. International rail traffic via West Berlin, such as the Paris-Warsaw connection, is largely unaffected. Several hundred travellers were stranded Sunday morning at FRG railway stations. The FRG railway used buses. In this way 400 travellers were taken from Hanover to West Berlin in eight buses. Several buses left Nuremberg (for West Berlin). The FRG railway has requested travellers to use international trains--such as the Paris-Warsaw train--which are running normally, if with some delay. These trains have been bypassing West Berlin and stopping in East Berlin, from where travellers for West Berlin are taken by GDR state railway buses to West Berlin.

17 Trains Canceled

LD211007 Hamburg DPA in German 0956 GMT 21 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Berlin/Hamburg, 21 Sep (DPA)--A total of 17 trains to and from West Berlin were canceled last night on account of the strike by GDR state railways employees in West Berlin. The central transport management of the federal railways said in Mainz on Sunday that nine of the trains running between the Federal Republic and West Berlin had not been accepted at the GDR border. Eight trains running from West Berlin to the FRG were canceled.

Schmidt Calls for Calm

LD211544 Hamburg DPA in German 1435 GMT 21 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin, 21 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government is following the current events surrounding the strike by GDR state railways employees in West Berlin "with the greatest attention," but sees no reason to dramatize the present situation. Speaking at a IG Metall meeting [metal industry trade union] in Berlin, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said today that the strike is raising many complicated questions, some touching on Berlin, as well as international questions. However, in this case the Federal Government adheres to the principle "no interference in industrial conflicts and no statements on the demands and positions of the two sides." The federal chancellor underlined Berlin Governing Mayor Stobbe's view that Berlin's supply situation is safe. Schmidt called for calm and "not to exert pressure--on whichever side." The conflict would have to be solved by those immediately concerned and he hoped agreement would be reached.

BUNDESBANK REDUCES LOMBARD RATE

LD181410 Hamburg DPA in German 1101 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Frankfurt, 18 Sep (DPA)--The Central Bank Council of the German Federal Bank today decided to reduce the Lombard rate--the rate of interest for advances on securities--from the present 9.5 to 9 percent effective tomorrow. A press release by the Bundesbank notes that the policy of a "certain easing" will continue. The discount rate, which since the beginning of May has been at the record level of 7.5 percent, remains unchanged.

BARRE SAYS FRANCE 'INTRANSIGENT' OVER CAP

NC192306 Paris AFP in English 2257 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Bordeaux, France, 19 Sep (AFP)--France will make no fundamental changes in the European Common Agricultural Policy [CAP] and if Britain wishes such changes it could be left behind in European development, French Prime Minister Raymond Barre said here tonight. In a blunt speech at a dinner to mark the opening of the Franco-British Council meeting here, Mr. Barre told his British counterpart Margaret Thatcher that France was "intransigent" on changes in the agricultural policy. Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Barre arrived here after talks in Paris with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, in which European questions took second place. In a speech that covered many of the points left unsaid in Paris, Mr. Barre reminded the British premier that France had also adjusted to the European plan. "Our success drew you closer, and we heartily welcomed you to our club whose rules and obligations you have freely accepted. France knows they are strict. For its part, France has fulfilled all its commitments," Mr Barre said in an apparent reference to British hopes to amend the EEC budget rules. But Mr. Barre warned that France planned to continue European construction and "hopes that all present and future member states of the Community will contribute to its progress, without, however, being forced to participate in it at the same time and in the same manner".

DISPUTE ON IRAN FUNDING OF NUCLEAR PLANT NEGOTIATED

[Text] Paris, 20 Sep (AFP)--The French-Iranian dispute over joint funding for a uranium-enriching plant in France's Rhone Valley is being negotiated in "a good atmosphere," according to officials of Eurodif, the company that runs the plant. During the current Paris meetings of the general assembly of Sofidif (the French-Iranian organization for uranium enrichment by gas diffusion), which owns 25 percent of Eurodif, Iran's deputy minister for energy and director of the Iranian Atomic Energy Organization, (Fereidun Sahabi), has met several times with Eurodif directors.

The dispute follows Iran's decision to end its nuclear program and cancel orders made to France and West Germany by the ex-shah's regime. Eurodif, established in November 1973 to build the uranium enrichment factory at Tricastin, has not received promised funds from Iran since 1978. On October 24, 1979, the Parisian Court of Commerce authorized Eurodif to seize 9,000 million francs (2,250 million dollars) of Iranian assets invested in French state funds and the French Atomic Energy Commission. The commission had received, in 1974, a loan of almost 5,000 million francs (1,000 million dollars) from the Iranian Government in return for "entry rights" into Eurodif, access to nuclear technology and aid in nuclear development. In December 1979, France rejected Iran's demand for revocation of the seizure order. Iran then appealed and the decision, originally scheduled for July 9, has been postponed to October 22. The delay has afforded time for the talks and a possible pre-judgment solution to the problem. A recent occurence has led to optimism, for Iran said that it wants to "remove" its 10 percent of enriched uranium produced at the Tricastin plant. With its nuclear program shut down, Iran probably hopes to find a high-paying customer for the uranium.

NEW AMBASSADOR TO IRAN APPOINTED

NC201117 Paris AFP in English 1023 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Paris, 20 Sep (AFP)--The French Government announced today that it was sending the top Africa man in its Foreign Ministry as ambassador to Iran and replacing him by a veteran diplomat with experience in Africa and the Middle East. Announcements in the OFFICIAL GAZETTE said that Guy Georgy, 61, director of African and Madagascan affairs at the Quai d'Orsay since 1975, would go to Tehran and that Jean Herly, 60, would take his place. Mr Georgy, who replaces Raoul Delaye in Iran, began his career as cabinet chief of the French Overseas Ministry in 1955. He became successively secretary general to the governor of Gabon, economic planning director at the high commissions in Senegal and then Congo, ambassador to Bolivia, to Benin and then to Libya before returning to Paris.

THATCHER CALLS FOR CLOSER COOPERATION WITHIN EEC

NC191701 Paris AFP in English 1646 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] Bordeaux, France, 19 Sep (AFP)--British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher today urged closer cooperation within the European Economic Community, saying this would benefit both member states and the world in general.

Speaking at a meeting of the Franco-British Council, she said this was "an age when pressure on the world's resources of food, energy and essential raw materials grows day by day: an age when our democratic systems and cultures are increasingly threatened and derided by those who appreciate the benefits of neither.

"At such a time and in such a world it is no longer possible for even the greatest European nation to stand wholly on its own," Mrs Thatcher said.

This, she added, was "why France and Britain and the other present and future members of the European Community have resolved... to pool their resources to preserve and strengthen peace and liberty, and to ensure the economic and social progress of their countries by common action."

The British leader also asked that Europe not limit its concerns to affairs of the continent alone.

"The disparity in wealth between the richer nations of the world... and the poorer must be diminished," she said. "It is therefore both morally and economically right that we should help the countries of the Third World to help themselves."

Mrs Thatcher spoke as well of the need to help Third World countries to "resolve the burning political issues--both local and regional--which divert them from their other pressing tasks."

Sounding a warning on dangers posed by the Soviet Union, she said: "Those of us who live in Western Europe cannot ignore the menacing accumulation of modern weapons and highly trained soldiers deployed on our doorstep.

"The deployments are said to be defensive. But allegedly so was the invasion of Afghanistan," she noted.

"Europe," she stressed, "must maintain its strength." To that end, she called for "fuller and closer defence cooperation with France" and for more joint production of military equipment.

Alluding to past differences between France and Britain, Mrs Thatcher said: "After China and Japan, we are two of the oldest nation states in the world. With that inevitably goes pride and--let us be frank--a degree of wilfulness.... Yet it is our common interests, not our past rivalries, which need to be emphasised now."

She called for new initiatives and policies outside agriculture to "develop the scope for common action and produce a better balance in the way the Community disposes its resources."

Urges Close Ties With France

LD192004 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1845 GMT 19 Sep 80

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Text] A new Entente Cordiale between Britain and France was called for tonight by the prime minister.

Mrs Thatcher suggested a closer relationship between the two countries--within the Common Market and on a political and trade level--during a speech to the Franco-British Council in Bordeaux.

In one of the strongest speeches she has made in favour of the Common Market Mrs Thatcher said: "Our differences must not--and I am determined that they will not--be allowed to obscure the longer terms and external dangers."

She said full development of the Community's strength "will require the nations of Europe to develop wise, coherent and mutually beneficial policies."

It would not be easy "but the role of France and Britain in the European enterprise is literally vital."

"The outside world is under no illusions about what has been achieved already. Europe's importance in the world is growing." Much of Europe now lived under Soviet domination which prevented them developing to the full.

"The tragic division of Europe will not be shortlived," she said.

But its effects could be mitigated and the West should promote all contacts "between the two halves of what should be one continent. We can and should pursue detente provided we always bear in mind that detente is a two-way process."

Mrs Thatcher warned that the military strength of the Soviet Union had continued to grow against the background of "the moral, political and economic bankruptcy of Soviet Marxism."

"There can be no confidence that the Russians will refrain from using their massive forces, if not for an armed attack then as a means of political pressure on a weak and disunited Europe," she warned.

Britain was ready to develop fuller defence co-operation with France. And Mrs Thatcher added: "Britain would also like to develop closer links with France in the civil industrial field."

PUBLIC POLLED ON CRUISE MISSILES, DISARMAMENT

LD212245 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2148 GMT 21 Sep 80

[Text] London, 21 Sep (LPA)--An opinion poll has claimed that nearly half the people it questioned--48 percent--fear there will be a nuclear war in their lifetime. A Marplan poll for the BBC programme Panorama has also claimed that 70 percent of people questioned thought a nuclear war more likely now than they did a year ago.

But despite the fears only 33 percent wanted Britain to take the lead in unilateral disarmament.

A small majority, 53 percent, thought the Conservative government was right in allowing American cruise missiles to be based in this country.

In contrast, only 48 percent supported the purchase of the new Trident missile to replace Britain's Polaris fleet, the poll said.

The results of the poll will be detailed in the Panorama programme screened tomorrow night.

The poll questioned 762 people throughout Britain.

[Text] In a letter to President Kiprianou, Deputy Stavros Ambizas informs him that he has withdrawn from the Democratic Party which he represented in parliament. In his letter Mr Ambizas criticizes Mr Kiprianou for converting the Democratic Party from a ruling party to a party of continuous protest, disrepute and mockery. He also says that the president's policy exposes both the party and the country in general to serious dangers.

Mikhailidhis Resignation

NC211233 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 21 Sep 80 pp 1, 12

[Excerpt] According to verified information, the exhaustive discussions in private meetings among president of the republic and party leader Kiprianou, House President and DIKO [Democratic Party] Vice President Mikhailidhis and parliamentary representative Ambizas, failed to heal the rift among the party leadership. The longstanding disagreements, discord and differences in views persist on basic principles and positions on a large number of issues--ranging from national, domestic and foreign issues, ways of governing, the domestic front in general and issues of principles and substance to party policy procedures, methods and tactics--leaving the gaps unbridged. Thus the aforementioned longexisting radical disagreements over serious issues of principles and substance have led to a final rift between President Kiprianou and House President and DIKO Vice President Mikhailidhis, resulting in the latter's decision to withdraw from the party. The same source says that in view of the serious turn that the intraparty crisis has now taken, it is expected that Mikhailidhis will make a public announcement in which he will clarify the positions on all the above issues over which he is in disagreement with the president of the republic, and expose the reasons for his disassociation.

It is certain that Mikhailidhis' views are shared by a great number of DIKO leaders and cadres on a pan-Cypriot scale, amongst them members of the parliamentary group and the DIKO political bureau whom Mikhailidhis has already informed of his decision. Until this moment it is not clear what form Mikhailidhis' disassociation from DIKO will take, that is to say if he will confine himself to expressing his reasons for this decision or if he will simultaneously make a statement of intent concerning his political future and his position in general on the political matters of the country.

MITSOTAKIS COMMENTS ON NATO, CYPRUS ISSUES

AT211448 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 21 Sep 80 p 20

[Text] Foreign Minister Mitsotakis has drawn the attention of everybody, especially that of the allies, to the Aegean issue. He has stressed that everybody should take into consideration the sensitivity of the Greeks on this issue which, in the final analysis, concerns our country's integrity. Specifically, while speaking yesterday at the New Democracy regional meeting in Alexandroupolis and referring to the events in Turkey and to Greek-Turkish relations, Mitsotakis stressed the following: "In any case, our country has already declared its wish to continue the Greek-Turkish dialogue because it believes that dialogue is the only way to solve differences between us. We believe that significant steps can be taken toward solving differences with our neighboring country.

"In any case, the road toward settlement may prove to be rather long. We need stability in our area to facilitate efforts for finding peaceful solutions. What we have repeatedly stressed," he added, "is that maintaining balance in the Aegean at this time constitutes a factor of stability. This maintenance is the firm aim of our country and the central line of our foreign and defense policies. Our allies must seriously confront this factor with special consideration for the exceptional sensitivity of the Greeks on this issue which, in the final analysis, concerns their country's integrity."

At another point in his speech Mitsotakis said: "The government believes that in order to maintain the balance in the Aegean our country must return to the NATO military wing. In recent months significant steps have been taken in this direction and one can hope that this target, which the new government has set forth with its policy statement, can be implemented. It is self-evident that any agreement toward that goal must be based on the Haig-Davos plan and cannot render our position inside NATO worse than it was in 1974 when we withdrew.

"The outstanding issues which exist in our country's relations with the United States regarding military facilities must be settled within the framework of our return to NATO," he added. "We want to return to NATO, we want to normalize our relations with our great ally but both these things are parallel."

On the Cyprus issue, he continued, the Greek position remains steadfast: that the Cypriots be responsible for decisions and initiatives and that the Cyprus issue be solved within the framework of the intercommunal dialogue and on the basis of UN resolutions to date. The Greek Government supports the struggle of the Cypriots for the restoration of the sovereignty and integrity of the island and this support is more active and greater than at any other time in the past. The Cyprus issue is our national issue and consequently cannot help being one of the basic axes of our foreign policy.

In the ordeal Cyprus is currently passing through it needs the support, affection, concern and more active help and the frequent presence of Greece on its soil. We have increased contacts and visits and, as has already been announced, Cyprus will be visited by the prime minister and the president of the republic in addition, of course, to the foreign minister who will precede them. This visit will be a first in the history of the Cyprus state.

The spokesman denied that the defense minister communicated with the president of the republic on this issue.

BELGIAN FOREIGN MINISTER AFFIRMS COMMITMENT TO NATO

LD231050 Brussels Domestic Service in French 0900 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] Let us report from the United States the meeting between the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs Charles-Ferdinad Nothomb and President Carter's eminence grise, Mr Zbigniew Brzezinski. Mr Nothomb has said in fact that Belgium is a loyal partner of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, NATO, and that the statement adopted last Friday by the Belgian Government on the installation of new nuclear missiles in Belgium must be understood as a reaffirmation of Belgium's engagements vis-a-vis NATO. Finally, still according to Mr Nothomb, there is no neutralist political current in Belgium.

PREMIER VIEWS MISSILES, BRUSSELS STATUS, OTHER ISSUES

LD221055 Brussels LE SOIR in French 12 Sep 80 p 5

[LE SOIR interview with Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens: "Federalism Must Continue To Be a Factor Which Unites the Communities"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Excerpt] [Question] Prime Minister, let's talk about national defense, missiles and so forth but without getting bogged down in technical aspects. What is the fundamental principle which guides your action in the national defense sphere?

[Answer] I will make myself clear: We must honor the pledges made in the collective defense system known as the Atlantic alliance. Any other attitude is harmful. What I am saying is not only in keeping with the government statement but it is also my deep conviction.

[Question] Our defense system must therefore have the means to honor its commitments?

[Answer] Yes. Belgium must and can play a role in the European Community and the alliance. The headquarters of the Commission, NATO and the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers, Europe, are in Belgium. We are not running the risk of damaging our image because of our internal quarrels in the defense and foreign policy spheres. However, there are of course some difficulties in our army's administration. We need to examine the cost efficiency of our defense effort and the budget funds allotted to it. That is the aim of our recent decision [to set up a commission to study defense policy problems].

[Question] I would like to ask the same question about the missiles. What stance do you take among those who condemn signs of a "Munich spirit" and those who deplore an "excessive escalation in the arms race?"

[Answer] I follow the same line as Chancellor Schmidt. If we really want negotiations with the Soviet Union to succeed we must show that we take a tough line. In practical terms, Belgium accepts NATO's collective decision but will take a decision on the question of deploying missiles on its territory at a later date. Contacts will be made. We intend to clarify this section of the government declaration which is a little vague.

[Question] Will parliament be asked to give its verdict before or after the decision is taken?

[Answer] The government--and it alone--must take the decision. It must then inform parliament of its decision and parliament can then accept or reject it.

[Question] Will the government resign if parliament rejects its decision?

[Answer] Yes, of course. However it is also only natural that the government should inform parliament about the facts of the case before taking a decision.

[Question] You have already done so in committee. Will you do so in open session?

[Answer] That would be a reversal of roles.

Brussels: The Government Will Put Forward Proposals

[Question] Let's turn to another question, Prime Minister, which will come back to the fore soon--the question of Brussels' status. When will the dialogue be reopened?

[Answer] In October.

[Question] What form will it take?

[Answer] That has yet to be decided. Mr Tindemans has suggested convening a new "Group of 28." Before the vacation I said I think it wise to invite all parties to discuss Brussels' status.

[Question] There has been talk of secret contacts?

[Answer] To my knowledge there have been none.

[Question] So, there will be a rehash of the "Group of 28." Will you chair the session?

[Answer] The prime minister chaired the original "Group of 28." Do people want that? It would be politically more significant. The government would be called upon to take risks.... However, people may want to set up a less formal commission?

[Question] What do you want?

[Answer] My feeling is that the government should assume its responsibilities. That would lead me to chair the group's work.

[Question] Would you put forward specific plans for Brussels' future status?

[Answer] Definitely! That is the government's role. I would like to point out in passing that we absolutely must reach and implement a government agreement before the 1982 commune elections.

[Question] Do you feel that progress has been made on this question? Do you feel that thinking has changed?

[Answer] There is no doubt that something has changed in the country. Of course it is not yet very evident but the political world is aware of it. The Walloons have obtained the regionalization that have been demanding for 10 years. The Walloon region will be able to decide on a whole series of very important problems. We are therefore going to examine the Brussels problem in a new spirit. The two sides--the French-speaking side and the Flemish side--have an interest in succeeding. If the commune elections take place without this problem being settled we run the risk of disaster, notable for the Flemings in the capital, the whole community problem would be raised again.

You know that Flemish participation in the administration of Brussels came about simply because the Flemings put forward candidates on bilingual candidate lists. They did so against the wishes of many Flemish movements. Today, however, people want separate lists for Flemings and French-speaking candidates. That will not guarantee Flemish participation in the administration. We must find a solution which guarantees real participation by both communities in administering Brussels. That is why I feel we must first achieve autonomy in the sphere of matters concerning individuals at commune level too. I also feel we must guarantee equivalent--I do not say equal--participation by the two communities in the administration....

[Question] Equivalent?

[Answer] In other words not equal numbers....

[Question] There would not be parity then?

[Answer] No. Equivalent participation. It is possible to reach a solution on that basis. If we do not, we will have entirely French-speaking bodies in some communes. That is unacceptable. This is an essential part of the application of clause 107D for the Brussels region.

[Question] Is that acceptable to the French-speaking parties?

[Answer] I do not believe that these principles will be opposed very much. Even the French-speaking front has accepted them. The main thing is to find a way of implementing them....

[Question] Is there any possibility of discussing Brussels' boundaries again? [LE SOIR notes absence of reply]

[Question] How shall I convey your gesture in writing? [LE SOIR notes absence of reply]

[Question] I will rephrase the question. What can the French-speaking inhabitants on the outskirts be offered since the Flemings have rejected the idea of giving them special personal rights?

[Answer] That is the root of the problem. I do not think it would be useful for me to suggest a solution at the present time.... As prime minister, any stance I take in this sphere might be dangerous and might make it more difficult to find a solution.

One Third of the Budget for Regions Soon

[Question] Another question on the regionalization you have mentioned. Do you believe that your state reform is federalist in inspiration when the regions and communities only have a 7 percent share of the total state budget?

[Answer] The figure of 7 percent is wrong. It is true that the total allocations are set down in the law, at least as far as current spending is concerned, in other words 15 billion [Belgian francs] for the regions and 40 billion for the communities....

[Question] Out of a total of more than 1,000 billion?

[Answer] It should be noted that for 1981 funds allocated to the regions will be increased to 18 billion and to 43 billion for the communities. Furthermore, can it reasonable be claimed that the national education budgets are national? Although passed by the national parliament, they are in fact funds allotted to the communities. That represents a sum of 220 billion administered autonomously. The education pact is the only thing preventing this budget from being transfered completely to the communities. I admit that the state reform will not be completed until the national education budgets are passed by the community councils.

[Question] So you admit that the reform is not definitive?

[Answer] I would say that it is not complete. I will continue my explanation. Regarding the commune and province funds, namely 62 billion, it should be noted that aside from Brabant Province distribution is carried out by regional bodies. In addition, various taxes will be returned to the regions and communities. This means that in 5 or 10 years time one-third of the national budget will be entrusted to the communities and regions. This proportion is analogous to the situation in other federal states such as Germany, Switzerland and Canada...

GENSCHER MEETS WITH HUANG HUA, MUSKIE IN NEW YORK

LD221844 Hamburg DPA in German 1648 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] New York (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and the Chinese vice premier and foreign minister, Huang Hua, have described the people's right to self-determination as a prerequisite for world peace. They arrived at this joint assessment during a 1-hour exchange of views on the sidelines of the UN in New York. The meeting was the first of a series of talks which Genscher will have with foreign ministers from Western, Eastern and Third World countries. Around noon, Genscher met American Secretary of State Edmund Muskie.

Important topics in the talks between Genscher and Muskie in the residence of the Bonn UN ambassador and newly-elected president of the General Assembly, Rudeiger von Wechmar, were said to be the forthcoming American-Soviet negotiations on nuclear medium-range missiles, developments in Turkey, the situation in Poland and the consequences of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Genscher also spoke about Afghanistan with Huang Hua and expressed support for the efforts of the Islamic states to find a solution to the conflict. Genscher and Huang Hua also discussed the situation in Kampuchea, Korea and the Middle East. Genscher explained the Bonn initiative on the international refugee situation, which he will present in his speech to the UN on Wednesday. According to members of the German delegation, Genscher's argument that research ought also to be carried out into the deeper political causes behind the great streams of refugees met with the approval of the Chinese foreign minister.

BOELLING CRITICIZES REPORTS OF SOVIET TROOP MOVEMENTS

LD221548 Hamburg DPA in German 1445 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 22 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government today spoke out against press reports of Soviet troop movements on Poland's borders with the Soviet Union and the GDR and speculations that they were in connection with an invasion or an intimidation of Poland. With reference to such a report in the U.S. newspaper the Boston GLOBE and following reports in the Federal German press, Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling said today that these reports, which actually originated in the United States, have nothing whatever to do with responsible journalism. There were absolutely no facts at all to justify the reports.

Boelling said that sensational stories of this kind could only harm the Polish people and the Polish leadership in their efforts to find solutions to Poland's problems that were free of outside influence.

WORKERS CONTINUE RAILWAY STRIKE, CLASH WITH GDR POLICE

Berlin Senat To Discuss Strike

LD221108 Hamburg DPA in German 1023 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin, 22 Sep (DPA)--The Berlin Senat will deal with the effects of the Reichsbahn strike in a session tomorrow. Senat Spokesman Hermann Meyn said today that Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe and Economics Senator Wolfgang Lueder, who is also responsible for transport, will deliver reports on the situation at the start of the session.

An economics administration spokesman said that supplies to Berlin are still not jeopardized as a result of the Reichsbahn workers' strike. There were no difficulties in the city. [passage indistinct] Even after passenger rail transport was resumed, extra buses were provided for journeys to West Germany.

Rail Service 'Returns to Normal'

LD221304 Hamburg DPA in German 1148 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Mainz, 22 Sep (DPA)--Rail traffic to and from West Berlin has returned to normal. The Central Transport Authorities [ZTL] of the federal railways said today in Mainz that the GDR has been accepting and dispatching all trains since about 0900. The first train to leave was the Hamburg-Altona-Berlin express, which departed at 0843 via Buechen-Schwanheide. The Berlin-Cologne express from West Berlin is expected in Helmstedt at 1331. ZTL said that the German Reichsbahn had stated that all long-distance passenger trains can again run as scheduled.

Strikers Rebut GDR Management

LD221410 Hamburg DPA in German 1342 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin, 22 Sep (DPA)--The central strike leadership of the striking Reichsbahn workers in West Berlin has stated that the strikers will no longer work under the management of the German Reichsbahn of the GDR. A call was made to the Senat this afternoon because of the takeover of the [words indistinct] in West Berlin to hold negotiations with the allies and the competent GDR authorities.

Senat Rejects Strikers' Demand

LD221752 Hamburg DPA in German 1637 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Berline (DPA)--In the strike by West Berlin employees of the GDR railways the Berlin Senat has rejected demands by the central strike administration to the effect that the Senat assume operating rights of the railway in West Berlin. Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe said this evening that the Senat sees no possibility of meeting this wish. He said that the strikers' appeal is addressed to the wrong people. Stobbe pointed out that the Senat has stressed from the outset that the strike is a dispute between the West Berlin employees of the GDR railways and their employer. Under no circumstances can the GDR railways be released from their obligations to their employees.

GDR Railway Police Storm Signal Box

LD222114 Hamburg DPA in German 2002 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin (DPA)--According to the central strike committee of the striking GDR railway employees, the railway police have cleared another signal box by force. The strikers say that the police stormed the Ruhleben signal box with axes and crowbars, injuring one of the strikers. A few hours earlier they had cleared the Halensee signal box in the same way. It was reported that additional railway police and GDR railway employees from East Berlin had been assembled in West Berlin, possibly for an "attack" on the building where the central strike committee is located at the Moabit container station. Late this evening the West Berlin police confirmed that the Ruhleben signal was cleared and that one of the strikers was injured. They also stated that during the clearing operation by the East railway police no West Berlin police officers were present.

Soviet 'Observers' Witness Attack

[Summary] Berline (A)--The strike by employees of the GDR Reichsbahn in West Berlin took a "dramatic" turn for the worse during the night.

Railway police stormed the signal box at Moabit and as on previous occasions used axes and crowbars to force their way in. Twelve policemen were used against the four striking railwaymen who had occupied the signal box. The central strike committee assumes that a concerted attack against the Moabit container terminal is imminent. Railway police have assembled around the terminal. Two West Berlin policemen are observing the scene at the container terminal where 40 strikers have barricaded themselves.

The strike committee has sharply condemned the brutal manner in which the railway police cleared the signal boxes. Although no resistance was offered, one of the strikers was struck down by the police. The strike committee is bitter about the fact that West Berlin police were not present during the operation. The strike committee also drew attention to the presence of Soviet observers in uniform during the storming of the signal boxes. They had arrived in cars with Soviet registration plates.

Call Issued for Strikers To Assemble

LD230904 Hamburg DPA in German 0713 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin (DPA)--The strike committee of the striking West Berlin employees of the GDR Reichsbahn has called upon all strikers to assemble at the Moabit container terminal this morning. The railroad police cleared all the occupied signal boxes in the past 24 hours and the container terminal is now the only installation in the hands of the strikers. A strike committee spokesman said that there would be no attempts to reoccupy signal boxes. "We must now regroup and get a grip on the situation." The terminal has been barricaded and is guarded by pickets equipped with walkie-talkies.

It was still not clear this morning whether the clearing of the Reichsbahn signal boxes would enable the resumption of the S-Bahn urban railroad service and goods traffic which have been at a standstill for almost 1 week. During the night the railroad police cleared strikers by use of force from five signal boxes. They also used dogs. One strike picket was injured by the police.

FIRM DENIES SELLING AMMUNITION-MAKING EQUIPMENT TO USSR

LD191914 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1700 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] The Bielefeld Gildemeister Machine Tool Works has denied that it has delivered special machines or tools for the manufacture of ammunition to the USSR. Commenting on a report to this effect in DIE WELT, a board of management spokesman said today that there were no indications that the universal lathes which Gildemeistr had delivered to the USSR had been subsequently altered in the USSR for the manufacture of ammunition. This was possible in theory and the possibility could not be excluded. No manufacturer of machinery could protect himself against such an alteration of his products. The Federal Economics Ministry and the Federal Office for Trade and Industry are investigating the matter. The CDU/CSU opposition in Bonn has asked the Federal Government for an early clarification. Its spokesman on security, Woerner, spoke of well-nigh suicidal business practices.

DIE WELT Report

[Report by Bonn correspondent Heinz Vielain]

[Text] Bonn-DIE WELT will submit to the Bundestag Defense Policy Committee its evidence on the supply of German machines to the Soviet Union for the production of ammunition and weapon parts. Chief Editor Peter Boenisch made this offer yesterday to committee Chairman Manfred Woerner, since DIE WELT has been charged by Moscow with disseminating false reports.

A letter from the chief editor's board to Woerner says that DIE WELT decided to take the unusual step because the events require urgent clarification in the interest of the Federal Republic following the Soviet denials and the pacifying statements of the supplying firm Gildemeister. The official Soviet news agency TASS rejected on Saturday DIE WELT reports on the supply of machines for ammunition and arms production to the USSR, saying they were "false reports." Revelations by DIE WELT were said to be a provocation with the aim of discrediting the Federal Government's Ostpolitik.

The statement goes on to say that "it is obvious" that such reports are absurd. It was a "routine affair for DIE WELT to produce obvious falsifications." Such "provocations" have been made before, and they mainly pursue the aim of discrediting the Federal Government's Ostpolitik. According to TASS, "the obvious connection" between this report and the activities of the Bonn opposition is remarkable. It was therefore "not a coincidence" that the Union faction has simultaneously asked questions about this issue in the Bundestag.

Documents made available to DIE WELT of the Bielefeld machine tool factory Gildemeister dated 23 January this year demonstrate that since 1972 the factory has supplied in more than 280 cases machines to the Soviet Union which were labeled internally in the factory as products for the fabrication of ammunition and arms. The corresponding shipments were registered and contain the name of the customer (Stankoimport Moscow), the number of the order, the type of machine and the number of the work plans. The documents contain data on production possibilities production of shell cases, fuses and parts of weapons. In addition, a number of pieces of technical data were mentioned, demonstrating, as an arms expert told DIE WELT, that the machines were really destined for the production of the above-mentioned arms and ammunition parts.

The documents of 23 January 1980 demonstrate that Gildemeister has supplied machines that have been constructed for the production of arms and ammuniton, supplied them also to tension areas. Among the "customers" are Iraq and Syria. The Baghdad "Ministry of Ind." received machines for the production of fuses, shell cases and parts of weapons. According to Gildemeister's internal plant documents, Damascus received machines for the production of shells.

As regards the East bloc, the documents of the Bielefeld plant show that Yugoslavia received arms machines in addition to the USSR, namely machines for the production of "shell cases." In all cases where the Soviet Union and other states were supplied with machines putting out products not belonging to the arms technology field, it was properly stated. Instead of shell noses or fuses, valves, screws, gear wheels, boring spindles or even screen discs for cottage workers [rasterschreiben fuer heimwerker] were named as branch products.

Opposition spokesmen asked the Federal Government this weekend again to clarify the matter quickly. Carl Damm, the CDU/CSU Bundestag faction's arms policy spokesman, indicated that if need be the Bundetag Defense Policy Committee would have to become active as an investigating committee. That would particularly be the case if the Federal Government were unable to disprove that the known imports of machines for the production of ammunition took place without permission in line with the foreign trade bill, this seems impossible in view of the volume of these supplies and the international stature of the supplier.

IMPROVED ANGLO-FRENCH RELATIONS AT BORDEAUX REPORTED

[Michael Field dispatch: "'New Era' Opened in Anglo-French Relations"]

[Excerpt] Bordeaux--About 150 French and British prominent personalities yesterday ended what its British co-chairman, Lord Thomson of Montieth, called a "highly successful and historic conference." The three-day meeting, addressed at its opening banquet last Friday by both the prime minister and M. Raymond Barre, the French prime minister, followed immediately on a day of talks in Paris between Mrs Thatcher and President Giscard d'Estaing.

Organised by the Franco-British Council, which was formed after the queen's visit to France in 1972, the Bordeaux conference added an unofficial "epilogue" to the fifth Anglo-French summit itself. With relations rapidly thawing out because of the friendly atmosphere of the Paris talks, the Bordeaux meeting may in the opinion of many participants have opened a new era of frank, detailed consultation between Britain and France comparable with the regular exchanges existing between France and West Germany and the Konigswinter conversations between Britain and West Germany.

Three committees of specialists discussed political, economic and media aspects of Franco-British relations, seen by both sides to have badly deteriorated because of the big Common Market rows. Another looked at the developing countries and compared sometimes differing British and French approaches to their problems.

Calling the meeting a "laudable achievement," Lord Thomson added: "But we mustn't let the rosy glow of claret obscure the fact that there are problems between the two countries."

M. Barre, defending the Common Agricultural Policy [CAP], had quoted Lord Balfour as saying it was better to do something absurd, as some people thought the CAP was, but which had always been done, than to do something sensible that had never been done. "Lord Balfour said this in the House of Lords--an institution like the CAP which should be reformed but which it is in everybody's interest to preserve," Lord Thomson continued. "By the end of the century British housewives will be very glad to have the CAP providing secure food supplies in a world of increasing scarcity."

The French prime minister's defense, in front of Mrs Thatcher, of the CAP was variously interpreted in the conference. Some delegates, both French and British, thought it at variance with the incipient thaw, even saying that M. Barre's speech, which he did not embellish with asides, was a deliberate jolt to the new entente.

But on reflection it was generally agreed that the French prime minister's remarks, though somewhat patronising in tone, should be seen in their proper context. Only seven months from the French presidential election, the French Government cannot be seen by the electorate to waver on basic European policy. M. Barre said: "We are determined to maintain what has been called the 'Community achievement' and within it the CAP. Of course we are quite ready to study ways of improving it. But we shall remain instransigent on its fundamental principles: the unity of the Market and prices and Community 'financial solidarity'".

Contributions to the Bordeaux discussions were lively and frank, touching on many subjects usually considered taboo by diplomats: the "threat" to the French language from world-wide development of English, Britain's would-be special relationship with America, the "irresponsibility" of part of the press and media in each country, and the significance of apparent differences between the French and British attitudes to Russia and detente.

MARCHAIS DISCUSSES EUROCOMMUNISM, POLAND AT NEWS CONFERENCE

LD220831 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 10 Sep 80 pp 3-4

[Unattributed report on 9 September press conference given by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais to mark the publication of his book " L'Espoir au Present": "For Struggle and Change Without Waiting"]

[Excerpt] A journalist asked Georges Marchais whether his book "falls within the Eurocommunist current of thinking."

[Answer] I deal with the question of Eurocommunism in my book. I go a little further into that question in the book, on the basis of ideas which I had already had the opportunity to put forward. I refute the argument that Eurocommunism is dead--that is an idea which is put about but one we do not accept. I show that Eurocommunism has had and still has extremely positive aspects for the communist and workers parties and for our revolutionary struggle. Having said that, I feel that Eurocommunism has become too narrow and the notion must be extended.

I think this is necessary first for geographical reasons: There are a number of communist parties on various continents in the world--countries like Japan and Mexico--which advocate Eurocommunism. I will simply recall the fundamental basis of Eurocommunism: the convergence which exists among various parties on the search for a democratic path to socialism. I would like to add--and this touches on the crucial question of socialist democracy--that, in the socialist countries themselves, progress is now being made in the sphere of democracy and this is extremely important for both the present and the future.

Finally, we must take account of the fact that parties which do not claim to follow Marxism are busy building socialist societies in their countries in their own way. That is also a contribution and a new source of enrichment. Consequently, far from rejecting what has been termed Eurocommunism, I am confirming it but adding a dimension which corresponds to the age in which we live and to the considerable progress which has been made by the three main components of the revolutionary movement: the socialist countries, the national liberation movement, and the working class in capitalist countries. [answer ends]

Questioned on the differences which exist between the PCI, the PCE and the PCF in the ways in which they view Eurocommunism, Georges Marchais replied:

"There are probably nuances and differences between our parties. However, there are documents common to our three parties in which our verdict on Eurocommunism takes entirely the same line.

"There are differences, however, even radical differences and these are well known. I deal with this question in my book. For example, there is a fundamental difference of opinion between the PCE and ourselves on EC problems: We are opposed to Spain's entry into the Community. There are well-known differences between the PCI and us on the method of building a new Europe--a workers' Europe.

"However, the existence of differences with these fraternal parties or others--such as the CPSU on the question of socialist democracy--should not prevent solidarity on the questions on which we agree."

On the question of the Euroleft, Georges Marchais specified:

"My answer is clear and unambiguous; I do not believe in the 'Euroleft.' I do not believe it is possible to build a socialist society with Mrs Thatcher or even with Helmut Schmidt who, according to a recent article in a weekly publication, is regarded by Krupp and other German enterprises as an excellent administrator of the FRG's affairs! The 'Euroleft' as a method for progressing toward a socialist society in France is a blind alley and we will not go down it."

[Question] You speak of your "friend Gierek." What do you think of the fact that he has been dismissed because of illness? Couldn't that have happened to you when you suffered a heart attack?

[Answer] The reason I speak of "my friend Edward Gierek" is because he is indeed my friend. We have known each other for a long time and have done useful work together. We had very close relations. He was and still is my friend. You may be saying to yourselves that I have not used the same expression to describe Stanislaw Kania. The reason is simple: I do not know him yet. To use such a term would have been demagoguery on my part. However, he is my comrade in the sense that, like me, he is a communist and a fighter for socialism. Moreover I sent him a message yesterday which has been published by L'HUMANITE.

As regards the way in which the change was made--I do not wish to interfere in the Polish party's internal affairs, but I fully understand that it raises a question. First, the position of the Polish and French parties cannot be compared. One party is in power. The other is in opposition. Second, the Polish party is acting in a fairly difficult situation which rules out a power vacuum.

I think, therefore, that the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] Central Committee was forced to take this situation into consideration. Aside from that I cannot say anything.

You know my assessment of events in Poland. I made it known when I returned from my vacation. In my absence the comrades standing in for me--particularly Charles Fiterman--but I nonetheless wished to explain my stance on my return. [sentence as published]

Events in Poland do not lead us to call into question, in any way whatever, the assessment we have made of the socialist world and its generally positive record. Moreover I would like to point out that my book was completely finished before I left for the Olympic games with one reservation: the possibility of sending in my assessment of the Olympic games by telephone. I therefore did not change a single comma in my book following the events in Poland.

At no time during these strikes was socialism called into question by the workers or by the strike committee leaders. If that were not the case you would be forced to regard Walesa as a traitor or a renegade since he signed an agreement whose first article states in substance that the new trade unions which are to be formed will act within the framework of the social ownership of the means of production--the basis of socialist society in Poland.

Basically Poland, like other socialist countries, is facing a number of problems. The first of these problems stems from the development of socialist society. Socialist society's progress in all spheres is now raising the question of reforms to various extents in these countries--the question of what is generally termed the implementation of a new policy which is economic in nature but which raises both the problem of social progress, economic progress and that of socialist democracy.

Today the socialist countries must take measures which enable the workers to have real, infinitely deeper and greater participation in running public affairs at all levels.

In my view that is not primarily the result of any constraint. I think it is vitally necessary if socialist society is to take a new leap forward. I would like to add that the right conditions now exist for this new leap forward to be taken in all spheres, including socialist democracy. Democracy is an apprenticeship. This does not mean that there have been no faults or mistakes in the past. There are undoubtedly still obstacles now.

Basically this is the eternal struggle of the new against the old and it comes up against habits, bureaucracy, routines and even faults.

Of course, as far as Poland is concerned, I would have preferred things to be done calmly rather than in a crisis but it was in the nature of the process of building a new society.

I am therefore optimistic, especially since these questions have now been settled calmly. The violence we have seen took place in Boulogne against the fishermen and at Renault against our CGT comrade. It did not take place in Poland.

In other words, the pledge which Gierek made 10 years ago and which he confirmed to me when I spoke with him in December--"We will never again use repressive measures against the workers"--has been kept. In my view there is no better demonstration of socialism's strength. It should also be borne in mind that the capitalist countries' crisis has repercussions on the socialist countries' economies. That is due to the development of trade in the past few decades.

We must also bear in mind the obstinate refusal of the imperialist countries, especially the Americans, to adopt the path of disarmament. This imposes considerable spending in the arms sphere on the socialist countries because, quite legitimately, those countries wish to maintain a military balance which protects them from a possible attack by imperialism. What Jaures [French socialist who founded L'HUMANITE in 1904] said is still true: The reason why capitalism can no longer resort to war to overcome the crisis is simply that the balance of forces is no longer in its favor thanks notably to the socialist countries. It is therefore necessary for them to safeguard this balance of forces.

But while for the capitalist countries this effort is a source of profit for their multinational companies, for the socialist countries it is a burden on the process of building the new socialist society.

All this must be taken into consideration when assessing events in Poland. There are objective reasons for these events which are by far the most important, but there are also subjective causes and there have been faults and mistakes.

While there can be no doubt that the mistakes are collective and not merely personal, there can be no doubt that the man who has the most responsibility has his share in them. Knowing the loyalty of my friend E. Gierek, I am convinced that this is a question which he has not failed to put to himself. That explains why it was thought necessary in Poland to make changes.

I do not wish to interfere in internal Polish affairs but it is my ardent hope that all Polish communists without exception, the Polish workers and the Polish people will work together to solve the problems now facing them. We categorically reject the practice of consigning to oblivion politicians who, although they may have made mistakes or errors, have at a specific time in their country's history played an eminently positive role.

Questioned on Soviet statements referring to "the machinations of antisocialist elements," Georges Marchais replied:

Throughout these events our press and the statements made by all the party leaders without exception have been crystal clear: Events in Poland were not caused by antisocialist machinations. They were based on the existence of a discontent which was very real and justified in view of what is and what ought to be the situation in some spheres. That was and still is our position.

Having said that I cannot say that all 35 million Poles support socialism. There must be some people in some corners of the country who would like to return to capitalist society. It is so advantageous for some. We have no illusions on that score. However, that is a secondary factor and we do not regard it as important. We certainly do not believe that the events were caused by antisocialist machinations. As far as we know our Polish friends do not think that is the cause. The congress which is due to take place will probably make progress possible.

To be quite clear I would like to add that the solution to the problems facing Poland is in the hands of the Polish workers, people and the PZPR leaders alone. This has been the case hitherto and there can be no question of it being otherwise in the future.

POLISH OFFICIALS ANSWER 'BLUNT QUESTIONS' AT PCF FESTIVAL

[Text] The debate on Poland began at 1630 on Saturday [13 September] in the north enclosure [of the L'HUMANITE festival ground] led by Jacques Dimet and Jacques Estager, L'HUMANITE's special envoys to Warsaw and Gdansk, and with participation by representatives of the Polish United Workers Party newspapers, namely Central Committee member Ryszard Wojna, Jerzy (Kraszeuky), assistant editor in chief of TRYBUNA LUDU and (Sylvester Szatarz), Central Committee foreign policy section chief. The tent was full. After an introduction by Jacques Estager reviewing the situation in Poland in the past 10 years and the debate on the country's administration and its economic problems, the dialogue began.

There was discussion on the mistakes made by the party and the government, the means of remedying them, the nature of the socialist system and the essential issues of self-management and the party's links with the masses. How did this situation arise? How was a workers party able to lose contact with the working class? Relations with the church and questions of Poland's unity were raised. The Polish guests replied frankly to the blunt questions put to them. All stressed that the strike movement was not directed against socialism and was basically justified. Jacques Dimet discussed the Gdansk movement, demonstrating notably that it was only able to develop through already existing democratic practices. All the speakers stressed that it is crucially important for the future that the movement and the social crisis be successfully settled without any violence and with a desire to give preference to dialogue and political struggle, even though the battle is and will be bitter. Ryszard Wojna explained that the extraordinary congress would probably be held before the end of the year.

The debate between the Polish guests and the public then continued at the TRYBUNA LUDU stand in the international tent, where there was a constant stream of people throughout the 2 days.

QUAI D'ORSAY REFUSES TO COMMENT ON IRAQ-IRAN DISPUTE

[Text] It has just been reported that there is no comment from the Quai d'Orsay. The French Ministry of Foreign Affairs refused this morning to say anything about this open war between Iraq and Iran.

On the other hand, however, the French national airline, Air France, has decided to suspend its flights to Iran and Iraq.

FOREIGN MINISTER ADDRESSES UN ON FOREIGN POLICY

LD222140 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Unidentified correspondent's New York dispatch]

[Excerpts] Referring to Spanish membership in the European Community and to the subject of NATO, Spanish Foreign Minister Perez Llorca has told the UN General Assembly that future decisions on the way in which our solidarity with the defense of Western values and principles are expressed are a matter for Spain and Spain alone, in keeping with the UN Charter, the Helsinki Final Act and our constitution. It is worth recalling that the new foreign minister yesterday endorsed statements made by his predecessor, Mr Oreja, to the effect that 1981 will be a good time to raise the matter of Spain's joining the Atlantic alliance.

On this occasion also the references, customary at UN sessions, to Western Sahara and Gibraltar were made: [Begin Perez Llorca recording] The Spanish Government wishes to see an end to violence and suffering in Western Sahara, and it hopes that a just solution to this problem will be found. Based on respect for the principles and resolutions of this organization and of the OAU and on guaranteeing the right of that territory's inhabitants to free self-determination. Such is and will continue to be our position as regards this dispute of which Spain ceased to be a part when it irrevocably and definitively terminated its responsibilities as the power administering the Western Sahara territory. [end recording]

On the question of Gibraltar, he referred to the Lisbon declaration by Spain and Britain, under which the two countries undertake to initiate negotiations to resolve this colonial conflict. But he warned: [Begin recording] This will be no easy job. What is important is the existence on both sides of the political will to embark on a path which can have only one destination, that is, a solution of the dispute allowing Gibraltar to return to the Spanish fold and never again constitute an obstacle between Spain and the United Kingdom. [end recording]

Last year Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja said that Israel's right to exist ought to be recognized before the United Nations. In view of the fact that Spain has not yet established diplomatic relations with Israel, there was interest in learning what attitude the new minister might express on this international issue. Here now are his ideas regarding the Near East.

[Begin recording] The Spanish Government believes that a new political setup must be found, a central feature of which must be mutual recognition of Israel and of the PLO as parties directly involved in the conflict and acceptance of the need for both of them to renounce their all-or-nothing aims and come to the negotiating table. There can be no demands for Israel and its people to be obliterated from the map of the Near East, because nobody can deny that country its right to live in peace within borders which must be secure and recognized but which can never be based on the lesson of the Arab territories occupied by forces in 1967. [end recording]

CSCE PREPARATORY CONFERENCE SESSIONS CONTINUE

LD191640 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] The sessions preparing the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe continue. A-- report from the Palace of Congresses and Exhibitions:

After the two proposals on the agenda submitted by Spain and Hungary respectively, the CSCE preparatory meeting is advancing at a more regular pace.

In an official note issued last night by the Soviet delegation the Soviets welcomed the fact that the meeting has gotten fully into the real work of preparing the principal conference which begins in November. The aforementioned note says that the conference could be held at the foreign minister level.

This morning's work was based on the drawing-up of the first two points which are of little importance since they deal with the title of the conference and the logistics of the opening. On passing on to the third point--a much more thorny one--on the contributions of the UN Economic Commission for Europe, UNESCO and the nonparticipant Mediterranean countries, the Maltese delegation submitted a proposal on security in the Mediterranean. Although the session adjourned immediately, the Maltese proposal could provoke strong reactions both in the Eastern and the Western bloc, for which reason the delegates consider it very important. The sessions resume this afternoon.

First Disagreements on Substance

LD192024 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] At today's session of the preparatory meeting for the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the first disagreements on substance occurred regarding the agenda to be set for the main meeting, which will begin in Madrid on 11 November. Diplomatic sources described the situation as deadlocked, although the head of the Spanish delegation, Javier Ruperez, as well as Austrian delegate (Franz Thesker) rejected this interpretation, saying that the only thing to take place was that the point on the agenda had been reached at which agreement was more difficult. In this connection there is speculation about the possibility of the preparatory conference passing over the contentious subjects in order to continue approving other points, returning to the postponed points at a later date. Meanwhile, provisional agreement has been reached by consensus at today's session on the first two points on the agenda for the main conference in November. These two points establish the opening ceremony for the conference and the speeches which will be made during the inauguration ceremony.

SFRY Proposal

LD222131 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] The East European bloc has changed its mind on the subject of a Yugoslav proposal aimed at maintaining the process of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, according to sources at the preparatory session in Madrid. These sources have said that, whereas at this morning's session the Hungarian and East German delegations were of the view that the Yugoslav proposal should not be put up for consideration, the Soviet representatives this afternoon expressed their support and suggested that a text acceptable to all should be drafted. The Yugoslav proposal suggested adding to the agenda proposals tabled last week by Spain and Hungary--an amplificiation recommending that the main meeting in November should designate a date and venue for the next conference. In this way, experts think, Yugoslavia was trying to ensure that the CSCE process would be automatically maintained.

DENMARK

HAROLD BROWN LETTERS DISCUSSED BY FOLKETING COMMITTEE

LD221351 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 19 Sep 80 part 1 p 7

[Christian Broendum report: "Brown's Letters Are Still Confidential"]

[Text] U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown's letters to Defense Minister Poul Sogaard are still protected from publication or reporting of their contents, even after being presented to the Folketing Defense Committee yesterday. Unlike the meetings of the Foreign Affairs Committee the other Folketing committees' meetings are not confidential, but the Defense Committee's members have had to respect the fact that the letters from Harold Brown are classified confidential, committee Chairman Palle Simonsen, Conservative Party Folketing member, said after the meeting. The Defense Committee meeting, at which the defense minister was present for consultation, was quite short. Afterwards Poul Sogaard was unwilling to draw any conclusions from the letters' contents: It is still too early, he said. It is still intended that the letters will form part of the subject matter for the imminent defense settlement negotiations.

In connection with the letters Poul Sogaard would only say that he has replied in writing to the first from January, and had a conversation in May with Harold Brown about the second letter, after a decision made together with the prime minister and foreign minister. Finally Poul Sogaard said that it is the prime minister's decision whether the letters will be made public. Anker Jorgensen has said in the past that Denmark will not make them public without permission from the United States and that Denmark does not intend to ask the Americans for permission. Palle Simonsen, Conservative Party, said that the letters confirm that it is extremely important that the NATO nations increase their defense budgets by 3 percent. "It is political reality that a prerequisite for the guaranteed arrival of reinforcements is the possession of reasonably good national defenses."

After the meeting it was confirmed, in agreement with earlier reports in BERLINGSKE TIDENDE, that the U.S. defense secretary in his most recent letter not only expressed his concern on the possibilities of coming to the relief of Danish defense forces if a so-called "zero solution" is implemented. The U.S. defense secretary's concern also stretches to a 3-percent increase in the present defense budget. The explanation for this is that even a 3-percent solution would mean a considerable reduction in defense strength targets, although these would not be nearly so drastic as they would in the case of a zero solution. The zero solution would mean personnel reductions of about 10 percent and equipment reductions of about 40 percent. Defense Minister Poul Sogaard expects to start the negotiations on a new defense settlement with the Center Democrats, the Christian People's Party, the Liberals, the Conservatives and the Single Tax Party before the end of the month.

FINLAND

ANXIETIES EXPRESSED OVER NORWEGIAN CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING

LD191515 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 18 Sep 80 p 8

[Morten Fyhn report: "Finnish Concern Over Contingency Stockpiling"]

[Text] Helsinki, 17 September--The Norwegian plans for contingency stockpiling of U.S. military equipment has given rise to worries in Finland. The reason for this is anxieties that Scandinavia's stability could be changed. Therefore the Finns are following the Norwegian debate very closely; at the same time there are signs of concern over how the Soviet Union will react to the stockpiling.

Without directly mentioning contingency stockpiling President Kekkonen made a clear appeal to Norway on Wednesday not to do anything that could create a new situation in northern Europe.

"I have always valued the calm and sense of responsibility Norway has shown in its base policy and in its views on nuclear arms. I trust that this policy will remain unchanged in the future," Kekkonen said in a statement to Norwegian journalists.

The president said that he is deeply worried about the international situation and the deterioration in relations between the big powers.

"My heart is made heavy by the thought that the present crisis of confidence could give rise to decisions which would commit the world to an arms race for many years to come," Kekkonen said.

But he thought that there was still a basis for cautious optimism since the big powers seem to want to continue their dialogue, and he pointed to the Madrid followup Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The conference will begin in November, and Kekkonen said that it will show to what extent there is a genuine political desire to carry detente further.

"The situation in northern Europe is characterized by a stable security policy. This has been promoted by the close cooperation that the Scandinavian countries have established in many areas of life. It is my firm persuasion that it is in the interests of all the parties that the established security situation is preserved in the future," Kekkonen said. He extended a welcome to King Olav, who will be coming to Finland on an official visit shortly, and added that relations between Norway and Finland are characterized by a willingness to cooperate and feelings of solidarity.

The impression to be gained from meeting with leading Finnish Government members and officials is that Finland would have prefered it if the question of contingency stockpiling had not existed at all. However, there is widespread understanding of the Norwegian motives for wanting to store allied equipment for the use of troops in a crisis situation.

It is stressed that the matter is first and foremost a internal Norwegian affair in which Finland does not want to interfere. Finland dislikes any measure that means a change in the usual picture of northern Europe, because it could be interpreted negatively in Moscow. Finnish worries over contingency stockpiling therefore reflect the extent of other reactions to contingency stockpiling. For their part the Finns are confident that Norway will not do anything that could threaten stability. But they are not so sure that the Russians will have the same confidence.

The Norwegian Government's plans for contingency stockpiling of military equipment for U.S. soldiers in central Norway and not in northern Norway have, however, been received with satisfaction in Helsinki. The Finns see this move as a clear indication of Norwegian willingness to take account of their neighbors, especially Finland's, position. It has been stressed to AFTENPOSTEN that stockpiling in Trondelag cannot be seen as a threat. Centrally placed Finnish sources say, however, that the Russian reactions to contingency stockpiling must be weighed together with the development of relations between the two superpowers in general.

Another reason for the intense Finnish interest in the debate on Norway and contingency stockpiling is put down to fears that the matter will be the subject of controversy in the election campaign before the Storting election next year. Prominent Finnish sources say openly that such controversy over foreign and security policy within the Norwegian Labor Party in a heated election campaign would be extremely unfortunate and could create uncertainty in other countries on Norway's policies on these questions.

FRYDENLUND CITED ON NEW YORK TALKS WITH GROMYKO

[Gunnar Selgaard report: "'Pleasant' Soviet-Norwegian Ministerial Meeting"]

[Text] New York, 19 September--Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund said after his hour-long talk with his Soviet counterpart Andrey Gromyko in New York on Friday that contingency stockpiling and the northern regions were not mentioned at all during the meeting. The two ministers are in New York to make speeches in the debate in the UN General Assembly next week.

In a conversation with AFTENPOSTEN, Frydenlund said that views were exchanged chiefly on two topics: the situation for negotiation in Europe on nuclear arms, and relations between Norway and the Soviet Union as neighbors.

The two parties agreed that practical cooperation between Norway and the Soviet Union is going well. However, Gromyko stated that there were aspects of Norwegian policy of which the Soviet Union was critical, without mentioning concrete examples. It was clear that he thought that relations between Norway and the Soviet Union could be better. But during the talks, which according to Frydenlund took place in a pleasant, relaxed atmosphere, he did not specify what aspects of relations he meant.

Frydenlund did not want to guess at what Gromyko meant. However, there is good reason to think that the Soviet foreign minister was thinking of contingency stockpiling, Norwegian policy on the northern regions, Norwegian support for NATO's arms modernization program, the Norwegian Olympics boycott and the Norwegian vote in the UN extraordinary session on the Middle East.

In the general exchange of views neither Afghanistan nor Poland were mentioned, Frydenlund said.

Frydenlund said that the talks, which were held on his initiative, were useful, not least because he is to pay an official visit to the Soviet Union later this year. The visit will take place in December, but the final dates have not yet been fixed.

Frydenlund stressed to Gromyko that Norway attaches great importance to starting negotiations on nuclear arms, and that Norway considers the objective to be a military balance on as low a level as possible, so that it will not be necessary to deploy new missiles. He also specified that such contacts are important because there will be contacts between the United States and the Soviet Union in such a vital field.

Concerning relations between Norway and the Soviet Union Frydenlund stressed to Gromyko that cooperation in a number of areas must be expanded. He mentioned as examples the facts that the joint shipping commission will hold a meeting in Moscow later this month, the joint fisheries commission will hold one next month, and the economic commission one in November, and that he himself will be visiting the Soviet Union in December.

In the next few days Frydenlund will meet a number of other foreign ministers, including several from African countries, from Israel, Egypt, Poland and the GDR. No meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie has been arranged.

THATCHER PREVIEWS VISIT TO GREECE, YUGOSLAVIA

AT201100 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Exclusive interview granted by British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher to the London correspondent of the Greek Radio and Television Service, Lambis Tsirigotakis, date not given--interview conducted in English with superimposed Greek translation]

[Text] [Tsirigotakis] During the 16 months Mrs Thatcher has been in power she has made very few official visits overseas. Consequently her decision to visit Greece was commented upon with particular attention among international circles. Are there any special reasons which made her decide on this visit? This was the question which started our interview with the British prime minister at Downing Street.

[Begin recording] [Thatcher] There are various reasons. This is the first official visit by a British prime minister to Greece in the past 22 years. This is a sufficiently long period of time. Second, Greece will soon become a member of the EEC. We have much to discuss on this matter. In conclusion it is our desire to discuss questions related to the West alliance.

[Question] Which will be the most basic issues to be discussed during your talks in Athens?

[Answer] There are many matters which we will discuss both as members of the Western alliance as well as partners in the EEC. Naturally we will also deal with bilateral problems, rather not problems but interests and commercial transactions.

[Question] Are you satisfied with the present level of relations, both political and commercial, between Britain and Greece? Officials in both countries argue that trade relations could be more creative.

[Answer] I think that commercial ties are reasonably good. Recently we have also established good relations in the defense sector. Naturally both countries are prepared to further expand these relations. Now as members of the EEC we belong to a free trade area and Britain has always been a country open to trade.

[Question] As you know, Greece and NATO have for some time been involved in hard negotiations on Greece's return to the military wing of the alliance. How does your government view this vital issue?

[Answer] We very much hope that Greece will be fully returned to NATO. This would unquestionably strengthen the North Atlantic alliance. We know that General Rogers is already conducting negotiations which we hope will have a successful outcome.

[Question] Could one of the reasons for your visit to Yugoslavia be that you now consider it a sensitive area?

[Answer] To date Yugoslavia has never been officially visited by a British prime minister, although invitations were often extended. President Tito came to Britain four times and members of our royal family visited Yugoslavia. At the same time and at a time when we try to live together in a sufficiently dangerous world, such meetings and talks either in one or the other country are always useful, particularly for heads of government.

[Question] What is your reaction to recent developments in Turkey?

[Answer] It is much too soon to judge. As a country Turkey is very important to NATO as well as to the Western alliance. It is our wish that law and order be restored as soon as possible and that Turkey's economic development continues.

[Question] As you said, Greece will soon become the 10th member of the EEC. How do you view Greek participation within the life of the European Community?

[Answer] We shall be ten instead of nine. I am certain that we will get along very well with Greece. Naturally Greece will have its own character and its own contribution like the other members which maintain their own character. I hope that now as a member of a wider market Greece will have more opportunities.

[Question] Lately the European Community has had to face serious internal problems. The most critical was your own disagreement over the budget. Could these problems have harmed the unity of the EEC?

[Answer] I believe that if we had not solved this problem we would today have been faced with much more serious difficulties. The British contribution to the EEC budget was heavy and it could not continue. Had we not found a solution then the unity of the EEC would have been in danger. Each one in the European Community and in each country must feel that he receives equal and objective treatment. Britain believed it did not receive equal treatment on the budget issue. The question, however, was solved and a great obstacle was removed.

[Question] Are you optimistic about the future of the European Community?

[Answer] Oh, indeed yes, that is why we joined it. We believe that the European Community has a bright future in world affairs. It is the greatest economic and commercial block in the world. The fat that other countries deal and negotiate with it as one body gives it many advantage in commercial transactions.

[Question] Unemployment is a huge problem facing your country and, more generally, the rest of the world today. Do you see ways to cut down this problem?

[Answer] I am afraid we are all facing unemployment as a result of the world economic crisis created by the great oil price hikes. We are forced to pay more for oil and less for other necessary items and services. As a result we have increased unemployment. This is surprising and tragic for all. Unfortunately, we are being led to a very difficult period. Often the answer given as a solution to today's crisis is: Put oil revenues back into the economy. This, however, is not easy. The countries which are affected most are the poor countries which cannot borrow more money. It is therefore essential that the problem is handled jointly, in other words with the cooperation of the Western countries, the developing countries, and the oil-producing countries. Otherwise the poor countries will suffer.

[Question] The last question concerns Mrs Thatcher's contacts in Athens.

[Answer] I will naturally meet President Karamanlis, who was the first to invite me to visit Greece. I will also meet Rallis who so politely renewed the invitation. I hope to have talks with both of them. [end recording]

REPRESENTATIVES DEPART FOR UN; NO DISCUSSION PLANNED

NC181635 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in English 1610 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] The foreign minister, Mr Rolandhis, leaves for New York on Sunday to head the Cyprus delegation to this year's session of the UN General Assembly. Mr Rolandhis will address the assembly during the general debate when foreign ministers and other heads of delegation set out their countries' positions on international issues.

An official source said that at this stage there is no question of discussing a Cyprus recourse. During his stay in New York, Mr Rolandhis will meet UN Secretary General Waldheim and will have contacts with colleagues from other countries.

Meanwhile, the committee of the UN General Assembly 35th session has adopted a recommendation that the Cyprus problem be placed on this year's agenda. On instructions from the government, the permanent representative of Cyprus at the United Nations has not sought the immediate fixing of a date for the Cyprus problem to be debated. This reflects the Cyprus Government's spirit of good will and its desire to facilitate to the maximum degree the holding of the intercommunal talks in a constructive atmosphere. The committee has decided that the time for the debate on Cyprus will be determined at the close of the general debate in the assembly.

Turkish Cypriot Atakol

TA211424 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 21 Sep 80

[Text] Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Minister Kenan Atakol left the island this morning to attend the UN General Assembly meetings in New York. Ministry Under Secretary Ozer Koray is accompanying Atakol on his visit.

In a statement at Ercan Airport before his departure, Atakol said he hoped that the decision by the Greek Cypriot side not to refer the Cyprus issue to the United Nations for the time being is the beginning of a demonstration of good will. Pointing out that at a time when the intercommunal talks have resumed, the Greek Cypriot administration is still continuing its economic embargo on the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Atakol said: A recent example of this is the fact that the Milan office of a tour operator sending tourists to the federated state has been forced to close because of pressure by the Greek Cypriot administration. The necessary moves are being made to insure the reopening of this office. However, it is not possible to regard these moves by the Greek Cypriot administration as a demonstration of good will at a time when the intercommunal talks have resumed. We will not say anything on this subject now in order not to cast a shadow over the intercommunal talks. However, we will take the matter to the negotiating table and defend our rights there.

Atakol expressed the wish that the Greek Cypriot administration would demonstrate good will in a bid to realize the long-desired peace. In New York, Atakol will hold meetings with the foreign ministers of various countries.

Rallis Dinner Speech

AT221720 Athens Press and Information Secretariat in English 22 Sep 80

[Text of speech by Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis at dinner given in honor of British Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher on 22 September in Athens]

[Text] Madam Prime Minister,

I wish to extend to you, Madam, on behalf of the government and the people of Greece a heartfelt welcome. Visits to this country by British prime ministers have never been a frequent occurrence despite the traditional ties that link so closely our two countries. In the last thirty-five years we received the visits of only two British prime ministers: Winston Churchill in 1944 and Harold MacMillan in 1958. But these were difficult times, they were periods of strife and stress.

We are happy to receive you today in more auspicious and promising circumstances. In three months' time Greece will be a full member of the European Communities. I would like, to take this occasion to reiterate my appreciation of British assistance and cooperation in bringing this result about. It was under British chairmanship of the Communities that our negotiations for accession got off the ground. It was then that the first hurdle, namely a global negotiation for the second enlargement, was cleared, and the decision taken to consider every candidacy on its own intrinsic merits. Later, in the course of the negotiations we benefited from the imagination, resourcefulness and helpfulness of your delegates at different levels. Your eagerness to push the ratification bill through parliament as speedily as possible augured well for the future of our cooperation within the communities.

Madam Prime Minister, as we all know, the close ties linking Great Britain and Greece do not date from our common struggle during the last two great wars. They were born when distinguished statesmen such as George Canning, great poets like Lord Byron and outstanding soldiers like Admiral Codrington eagerly helped the Greeks at a decisive moment in their history. And the Greek people fought side by side with the United Kingdom in the dramatic hours of the last world war when your noble nation was struggling alone for freedom and democracy.

Thus we see in you the leader of a great European country, our ally in war, our friend in peace--tomorrow our partner in the European Communities. I should add that we are doubly happy as we seem to share the same values, to worry about the same issues and to fight the same battles for both the present and the future.

We both agree that a just and lasting settlement of the tragic Cyprus problem can only be found in intercommunal talks under the auspices of the UN secretary general. There are also many other international issues in respect of which the policies of both our governments are imbued with the fundamental ideals enshrined in the UN Charter and in the Final Act of Helsinki, like the respect of human rights and human dignity or the peaceful settlement of disputes. The Greek people and the government which I have the privilege to lead are firmly attached to these ideals.

We are concerned over the risks to which detente is exposed and we would like to see it soon acquiring its full vigour and broadening its cover over a world plagued with the lack of understanding and confidence. We would like mutually beneficial cooperation not to be confined to Europe, but to spring from it and encompass all areas of potential conflict.

The eradication of mistrust among nations and as a result the elimination of fear constitutes a cogent contributing factor to the maintenance of peace and security. International confidence can only be built on a verifiable balance of military strength. We have consistently advocated, in world fora as well as in bilateral meetings, that such a balance of armaments should be kept at the lowest possible level, so that resources freed from military purposes be used to more constructive and useful aims. Among the latter aims, we do include not only the promotion of economic and social progress in our own countries but also the granting of assistance to developing nations. History will judge our era by the extent of our economic and technological endeavours for the development of those less fortunate.

Technical and economic cooperation on a multilateral basis initiated after the restoration of democracy in Greece has strengthened the policy of detente and stability in the Balkan Peninsula. Such a policy can only be pursued and expanded if our area is kept free from foreign interference.

As I said before, you have come to Greece, madam, at a time when we are preparing to join the European Communities as a full member. We have a long and happy relationship with Europe and we look forward to belonging to a family of nations with which we have so much in common in all fields. We look forward to the approaching moment when our European friends will also be our European partners. We particularly look forward to a close cooperation with Britain in both the economic and the political fields within the Community. Our bilateral economic and trade relations, to which your presence here will give an added impetus, should keep pace with our partnership in multilateral fora.

We also look forward to a greater scope of cooperation in the industrial and technological fields. At this point, I would like to wish you, Madam Prime Minister, and to your party, a constructive, useful and pleasant stay in Greece.

I now propose a toast to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, to your personal health and happiness as well as to the prosperity of the noble British nation.

PAPANDREOU WANTS CHAMBER ACTION ON NATO, BASES AGREEMENTS

AT221346 Athens TA NEA in Greek 22 Sep 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou yesterday denounced as "unacceptable" and "unconstitutional" the "secret diplomacy" which the government is following on national issues and proposed the ratification by the ("exclusively responsible") chamber of the Greek-U.S. agreement and of the return to the NATO military wing (as TA NEA exclusively reported last Tuesday). Speaking about the current situation in Turkey, Papandreou said:

"The military coup in Turkey--despite the brutal oppression of the Turkish people and the complete dislocation of every form of democratic expression--has been unable to consolidate its power. On the contrary, it is encountering the active resistance of the Turkish people along with some ramifications in the armed forces. "It is certain that not only will the generals not be able to control the deep social, radical and political contrasts that characterize contemporary Turkish society but, on the contrary, it will deepen them even more with unforeseen consequences for our neighboring country.

"The generals' coup once again confirmed the destabilizing role of NATO toward peace and democratic institutions because not only did it coincide with the NATO exercises and the southeastern wing commander's visit to Ankara but it was received by the United States and NATO with relief and by the EEC with only formal reservations. Thus the coup upset the much-touted New Democracy viewpoint that the EEC is a strong mainstay for the protection and support of democracy in Europe."

Then the PASOK chairman described as "literally unacceptable the fact that our country's government received a 'certificate of merit' from the United States for the 'understanding' it has manifested toward the violators--foreign and local--of democratic institutions in neighboring Turkey." Papandreou then added:

"But how could the government not have received a 'certificate of merit' when, before 24 hours had even passed after the abolition of the democratic institutions, it had made an agreement with the military junta for the continuation of the Greek-Turkish dialogue? And how could it not have received a certificate or naivete when it expressed hope that the generals would be more yielding than the political leadership concerning Greek-Turkish relations or return to NATO?"

"The government should--he went on to say--have understood at last that the U.S. Pentagon was behind the generals and that it is quickly spreading its tentacles in the Eastern Mediterranean, the Middle East and the Arab world. After the bitter experiences of our nation and our people--the NATO 7-year dictatorship, the planned partition of Cyprus, the continuing threat against our sovereignty in the Aegean--our people wonder why the government is so anxious to reconfine us to the military structure of the Atlantic Alliance--an alliance that, in addition to the evils it has piled upon our country, will make impossible our national defense plans against the increasing threat from NATOist Turkey. In 'exchange' for our return to the NATO military wing the government offers to the United States the renewal, the expansion and the extension of the role of the bases, of the 'facilities' which have transformed our country into an open field for their military operations in the Eastern Mediterranean, the Middle East and Southeast Asia. It seems, however, that a new initiative by the government is in the offing: The offer of 'facilities' to the armed forces of West Germany."

Papandreou's statement ends as follows: "We consider it our duty to remind the government of New Democracy once again that the agreements on both the bases and our country's return to the NATO military structure are the exclusive responsibility of the chamber, that secret diplomacy behind our people's backs and the backs of their representatives when highest national interests are at stake is not only unacceptable but is also unconstitutional."

Pointing out that the implementation of the economic stability measures will be continued in order to develop and organize the country's economy, Ulusu said of the foreign policy to be pursued by the government: The foundation of foreign relations will be based on Atataurk's principle of peace at home and peace in the world in accordance with the lofty interests of our nation. The Turkish Republic will remain loyal to the NATO alliance, will honor our other international agreements, and will continue our existing relations. Appeal to Workers

TA190928 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Station commentary: "The Attacks of the Junta Against Union Administrators, Leaders and Representatives Will Be Countered"]

[Text] Dear listeners: The junta has launched an attack with the aim of destroying the union movement and especially the class unions. The pro-American generals want to inflict a blow on the leaders, representatives and administrators of unions. However, they have not been successful in inflicting this blow from the beginning as they had hoped to do. They have still been unable to attain their goal: The arrest of thousands of workers. The working class is defending its real representatives and the union administrators and will continue to do so. The junta has called on the (?unions) and the workers representatives to surrender. The houses of those who have not surrendered are being raided. Their children, sisters, brothers and wives are being taken as hostages. However, all these inhuman pressures are not effective. Workers, union leaders, head representatives and representatives have not and will not surrender to the oppressors and the junta.

The head representative at a textile plant said the following to the workers: If we do not surrender the junta will consider us to be fugitives. What happens if those who treat us as animals now treat us as fugitives in the future?

The junta is having fired those workers it arrests. It is usurping their freedom. The workers are being kept in [word indistinct], which have been transformed into concentration camps, in a bid to subject them to the most barbarous tortures in the future. The junta is not after those who have violated the law. The junta is determined to render ineffective en masse the leaders of the working class. The junta wishes to abolish class unionism, the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions, the Machine Industry Workers Union and other class unions.

The junta aims at securing all the means of exploitation for the bosses of the Metal Products Industrialists Union, the textile and glass industry employers and the monopolist capitalists. Do not be fooled by the gilded decorations on the shoulders of the generals. The entire junta follows the orders of monopolies and imperialism. The junta has launched an attack against the people. Workers, defend your representative at your work places and your factories. Defend your unions. Every union which has been closed down should be revived within the struggles of the working class. The working class will not surrender. Unite against the junta!

VOTCP URGES TURKISH WORKERS ABROAD TO UNITE AGAINST JUNTA

TA201023 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Station commentary]

[Excerpts] There is a naked military dictatorship in Turkey. The junta, which is standing over our people, has launched an attack against the working class, the progressive democratic forces and all the toilers in a bid to secure the interests of imperialism, NATO and the collaborationist monopolies. Tens of thousands of workers representatives have been arrested and thrown into prisons. They are being subjected to heavy pressure.

The Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions has been banned. An end has been put to all union activities. The democratic press has been silenced completely. Basic human rights and freedoms have been abolished. Investigations are being opened of many party leaders and legislators.

The importance of international solidarity has increased under the current circumstances. Our workers employed in Europe, progressive forces and organizations--especially party organizations and communists--can and will play a significant role in the organization of a strong protest action on the European Continent and effective solidarity with the democratic forces in Turkey. The communists are and will continue to be in the front lines [of the struggle] aimed at revealing the true face of the junta to the public and at isolating it in the international arena.

The military junta has already received blow after blow. The frictions within NATO--the aggressive organization of imperialism--have increased following the coup in Turkey. As pointed out by PRAVDA on 18 September, the United States, which was concerned by these frictions, sent Christopher, with whom our people are well acquainted, to Bonn. The situation in Turkey was discussed at the meetings between Christopher and Bonn government officials. The view that the NATO policy to heavily arm Turkey and to turn it into the military base of imperialism was dragging Turkey to economic destruction and increasing domestic friction to the point of explosion was confirmed. Some of the European allies of the United States are opposed to pursuing this policy. At the NATO meeting, held in extraordinary session in Brussels, the Belgian and Danish Governments, as a first step, announced that they will not attend military maneuvers to be held on Turkish territory. As a result they were subjected to the heavy pressure of the U.S. and FRG administrators.

There has been a sharp decrease in the remittances of Turkish workers employed abroad. The junta's announcement that it will continue to implement the economic policy pursued by the ousted government, its decision to close down unions and its antiworker policy has increased the reaction of our workers. Our workers are well aware that the appointment of Ozal, the agent of monopolies, to head the economy means that their foreign currency will be exchanged at a rate well below the real rate through various financial operations and that it will be wasted on military expenditures aimed against the toilers. Our workers are deciding to defend their foreign currency earned by the sweat of their brow.

It is the basic duty of every citizen to strengthen international solidarity against the junta. The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] calls on our workers employed abroad and the progressive organizations to unite against the military dictatorship.

VOTCP REPORTS PARTICIPATION IN SOFIA PEACE MEETING BANNED

TA200951 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Text] The military junta has officially banned Turkey's participation in the "parliament of world peoples for peace" that will meet in Sofia on 23 September. Peace lovers with different political views and of different religions from 134 countries will be participating in the meeting to be held in Sofia. This prohibition by the pro-American junta reveals its antipeace attitude behind the statements made in favor of peace. This attitude of the pro-American junta has been received with hatred by our peace-loving people.

FOREIGN MINISTERS DISCUSS THORN MIDEAST TRIP DURING MEETING

[Philippe Lemaitre dispatch: "The Nine Maintain Their Cooperation With Ankara"]

[Text] Brussels--The Nine regard the results of their President Gaston Thorn's Middle East mission this summer as encouraging and hope to be able to put forward specific proposals during the European Council meeting at the end of the year. This emerged from the talks held by the nine foreign ministers in Brussels on 15 September.

"The statement issued by the Nine at the European Council meeting in Venice (13 June--LE MONDE note) is arousing very great attention and raising very great expectations in the Middle East. People would like Europe to state more clearly what it intends to do. Europe needs to go further in its proposals," [French Foreign Minister] Francois-Poncet said.

For the Nine it was less a question of analyzing the results of the Luxembourg minister's mission than deciding what will happen now. "The Nine should now move from general ideas to specific proposals," Mr Francois-Poncet pointed out. This task has been alloted to the political secretaries of the foreign ministries.

The ministers, who will meet again in New York on 24 September at the UN General Assembly, will then indicate the exact list of concepts mentioned in the Venice declaration. They are therefore entering a period of consideration, but it has been indicated that there will be no backing down. This new phase will take place in liaison with interlocutors in the Middle East. Some meetings have already been arranged: Mr Thorn will visit the West Bank on 29 September for a meeting with Palestinian representatives and at the end of the month is to meet with Arab League Secretary General Klibi.

On Monday the Nine also adopted a statement in which they express their anxiety over the situation in Lebanon. They reiterated their attachment to the country's unity and issued a warning to all those who might be planning to jeopardize it.

With regard to events in Turkey the foreign ministers showed great caution. The military coup d'etat was not condemned; far from it. The Nine did of course express their concern and after pointing to the Turkish generals' avowed intention to hand over power to civilians as soon as possible, stressed the need for human rights to be respected. However they then advocated maintaining close cooperation between the Community and Turkey. In other words the financial aid promised by the Nine will be supplied. "This is necessary if only to give the best possible chance to the process of returning to parliamentary democracy," Mr Francois-Poncet stated.

The Seat of the Institutions

For his colleagues' benefit the minister commented on a memorandum in which the French Government calls on member states--who have responsibility for this question--to settle the issue of the seat of the EEC institutions as quickly as possible. This document refers to "the problems which the European assembly is encountering in carrying out its functions... owing to the different locations of the places in which it carries on its activities." There are three such places: Strasbourg, where most of its sessions are held; Luxembourg, where the assembly's secretariat is situated and where several sessions take place and Brussels, where most of the parliamentary committees work. There is a strong trend in the assembly for Brussels to be made the primary if not the only place of work. It is to curb such pressure, Mr Francois-Poncent explained, that Paris wants to see decisions taken at the political level.

KREISKY COMMENTS ON SITUATION IN IRAQ, POSTPONES VISIT

AU231618 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1000 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Interview by unidentified correspondent with Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky in Vienna on 23 September--recorded]

[Excerpt] After today's Council of Ministers session, we asked Federal Chancellor Kreisky for his assessment of the situation in the Mideast crisis area. As a matter of fact he was supposed to travel to Baghdad in the next few weeks.

[Begin recording] It would be premature to say something here about the issue itself, no more than that this entire region has always constituted a hotbed of serious crisis for us, and I have been trying for a long time to explain why I think that great dangers for us all could spring from this area of the world. Naturally we are alarmed and we wish that the organization envisaged for such things--the United Nations--will fulfill its peace-keeping task. As far as the conflict as such is concerned, I would not like to say anything at the moment, that is as far as the causes are concerned. But this is one of the most dangerous regions concerning world policy. This remains true, I think, if one considers these crisis centers or crisis hotbeds converging as the most dangerous thing, something that spreads like a bushfire. Think of Afghanistan, think now of this conflict, think of the other conflicts around Israel, all this is extremely disquieting. It is about time for the great powers to attempt now to support the peace efforts that will begin. [end recording]

[Question] You should have gone on a visit to Iraq late next week. Will this visit take place or will it be postponed?

[Answer] Yesterday the Iraqi ambassador let me know that under the circumstances it would be appreciated if I would postpone this visit. Hence it will not take place. [end recording]

SWISS FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON VISIT TO VIENNA

AU221134 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 20/21 Sep 80 p 2

[A.U. report: "Aubert: CSCE Final Act Today No Longer Thinkable"]

[Summary] It would be hardly thinkable that the final Helsinki Act could be signed in the same manner today as it was 5 years ago. This was the highlight of Swiss Foreign Minister Aubert's press conference in Vienna on 19 September. He justified his skepticism with the "fundamentally" changed world situation. "One may not speak precisely of a cold war, but since 1945 the tension has never been as great as it is today." Switzerland now endorses the final acts and Aubert softened his sharp criticism of the CSCE. "Aubert also frankly admitted that different views existed in this respect on some points between Austria and Switzerland. At the preparatory meeting for the forthcoming CSCE round currently taking place in Madrid only problems of procedure and no thematic problems should be discussed in Switzerland's opinion. Concerning the disarmament proposals submitted by several countries Aubert pointed out that the neutrals should not lay themselves open in this respect for the time being."

Concerning bilateral problems Aubert urged completion of the Sankt Margarethen-Hoechst Highway border crossing point. He also noted that an expansion of the consular agreement between Vienna and Bern--under which Austrians and Swiss may use the same consulate in some cities--was being examined. Finally the possibility of an agreement on collecting debts and on bankruptcies was discussed.

BELGIAN CABINET LINKS MISSILES DECISION WITH U.S.-USSR TALKS

LD231315 Brussels LE SOIR in French 21-22 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[J.V.S. report: "An Equivocal Compromise Provisionally Ends the Missiles War"]

[Excerpt] It took all day Friday and various ups and downs for the government to finally take a stance on the Euromissiles affair. Lovers of clear and precise decisions will probably be disappointed but the majority has succeeded in avoiding a collapse. The French-Speaking and Flemish Socialist Parties are remaining in the government and the liberal defense minister has not threatened to resign.

The Belgian Government is giving a modified reply to the question of whether we should deploy 48 U.S. cruise missile on our territory in 1983. Indeed the final decision will depend on the results of the forthcoming negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on strategic arms limitation. This means that there is no longer any question of a delay. The statement adopted by the cabinet on Friday stipulates:

"The government hopes that the preliminary negotiations will produce positive results and, more especially, that the balance of theater nuclear weapons will be maintained at the lowest possible level. Belgium will make every effort to contribute to this. To enable the negotiations to take place in a clear atmosphere the government states that Belgium accepts, in advance, the conclusions reached in negotiations with the USSR and will play its part within the alliance. Should the negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union not produce any results Belgium will, together with its allies, take all the measures agreed among the NATO partners. To this end the government will examine the course of the negotiations every 6 months together with its allies and will draw the necessary conclusions within the alliance framework. Parliament will be kept informed at regular intervals."

Commenting on this statement Prime Minister Wilfried Martens stressed that the forthcoming U.S.-Soviet negotiations might lead to various solutions, such as a decision to abandon plans to deploy missiles or to implement limited and controlled deployment.

The statement adopted by the government also recalls the origin of the missiles' affair. Expressing the hope that negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union might open in the first half of October, the Belgian Government points out:

"Belgium confirms its adhesion to the twofold collective NATO decision taken on 12 December 1979 to modernize the alliance's theater nuclear weapons deployed in Europe and to offer the Soviet Union negotiations on these weapons. On 12 December 1979 the Belgian Government decided to delay its decision on the deployment of these missiles on Belgian territory for 6 months and after that period to assess the progress made in negotiations aimed at achieving a balanced reduction in the weapons. The government crisis made it impossible to carry out that decision. The government declaration of 20 May 1980 specified that the government would pursue the initiatives and contacts decided upon at that time [December 1979] and would examine to what extent and when the established conditions are fulfilled so that it can take its decision on the basis of those factors. Parliament will be given the chance to play the appropriate role. Moreover the prime minister told the house on 22 May that a decision could be taken before the NATO council meeting in Ankara in June 1980 but that in any case it should be taken before the end of 1981.

"At the NATO ministerial conference in Ankara, Belgium stated that it would attach particular importance to Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow and on the basis of that visit's results would decide what should be done to complete its evaluation.

"Following Chancellor Schmidt's talks in Moscow on 30 June and 1 July prospects for negotiations seemed more definite and the opening of preliminary negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union now seems imminent. The Belgian Government hopes that the negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on medium-range nuclear arms will be opened as soon as possible on reasonable and positive bases and that they will be concluded as quickly as possible. Belgium expects to be effectively involved in preparing and carrying out these negotiations. Belgium is prepared to make an appropriate contribution to the course of negotiations carried out in a responsible way. In this connection the Belgian Government thinks that a rapid ratification of SALT II would be likely to contribute to the success of the negotiations."

BELGIAN COMMUNIQUE ON WITHDRAWAL FROM NATO EXERCISE IN TURKEY

[Unattributed report: "No Belgian Paratroopers in NATO's Turkey Maneuvers"]

[Excerpts] Belgium has decided to withdraw its paratroops from the NATO "ANVIL EXPRESS" maneuvers which are taking place in Turkey from 11 September to 6 October. The United States, Britain, Italy and the FRG are taking part in this exercise. Our country was to be represented by 583 paratroopers from the Diest First Batallion who were due to leave on Monday.

Several factors are behind the Belgian decision. First, the statement made by [Prime Minister] Wilfried Martens after the cabinet meeting on Friday morning when he said that any coup d'etat is a failure for democracy and democrats of all countries, and he added that the Belgian Government firmly hopes there will be a rapid return to civilian life and democratic rules in Turkey.

During a special NATO ambassadors' meeting devoted to Turkey on Saturday evening, Belgium invoked the fact that this country "is now a military dictatorship" to justify the withdrawal of its paratroops. However another factor also intervened in the form of a statement by Foreign Minister Nothomb. While confirming that in view of recent political developments in Turkey it did not seem appropriate to continue the maneuvers, Mr Nothomb added that our country was now trying to limit its participation [in maneuvers] as much as possible for financial reasons.

A Joint Foreign Ministry and National Defense Communique

The Foreign Affairs and National Defense Ministries published the following communique on Monday:

"As is known, the need to make budget savings has led the Belgian Government to reduce its participation in allied maneuvers carried out within NATO's framework. As regards the maneuvers now taking place in Turkey, it had been planned to make an exception to these savings measures and send a paratroop batallion to Turkey. The events which took place in that country at the end of the week have led the Belgian Government to go back on that exception. It should be noted that of the 15 NATO member countries 5 are taking part in the maneuvers while 9, including Belgium, are not taking part. This has been done in agreement with our alliance partners."

Unofficial sources at the Foreign Ministry deny that Belgium's decision was described, as AFP reports, as "disastrous" by its partners. They added that it is not crucial whether a limited contingent of Belgian paratroopers does or does not take part in a relatively limited exercise like the one taking place in Turkey. The Belgian abstention from important maneuvers like those taking place in the FRG is clearly extremely significant. However the conclusion is that things should not be overdramatized with regard to the exercise planned in Turkey.

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON OSTPOLITIK, CSCE, DOMESTIC ISSUES

DW231152 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 23 Sep 80 p 8

[Interview by editors Hans Reiser and Dieter Schroeder with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt; date, place not given]

[Text] SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG (SZ): Your Ostpolitik is based on balance and stability. We will discuss the balance later on. How minor the internal stability of the East bloc really is has been demonstrated lately by the dramatic events in Poland. Doesn't this force you to reconsider matters without therefore interferring in the internal affairs of another country?

Schmidt: The example of Poland is particularly suitable to demonstrate the continuity of our foreign policy. The good-neighborly policy and the desire for reconciliation with Poland began with the social-liberal coalition at a time when Wladislaw Gomulka ruled in Poland. Later on Gomulka was replaced by Edward Gierek for domestic political reasons. Gierek was a completely different type of politician. But our policy did not have to be changed because of that. On the contrary, we continued it. We concluded with Gierek a second Polish treaty permitting 125,000 Germans to leave the country legally for the FRG. Now Gierek has been replaced by Mr Kania, and I predict that nothing significant will be changed with regard to German-Polish policy.

To give a clear answer to your question, no new analysis is needed because the analysis of the interests of the Polish people, as every top Polish state echelon must see it, permits a reliable assessment of the future. A footnote: You used the word interference. Some 35 governments of European states including the Soviet Union, the United States, Canada and the Vatican signed the Helsinki document 5 years ago today. Among the principles mentioned there is the principle of noninterference, which is one of the basic principles of international law anyway and which was postulated once more for all European states. I have been asked by Dr Helmut Kohl and other CDJ and CSU politicians kindly to voice my opinion on Poland as the federal chancellor. I have refused to do so, because when I sign something I keep to it. I would like to request that there be no future interference in Polish affairs, the same way that we must not interfere in Turkish affairs or wherever there are domestic tensions in European states.

SZ: The strikes in Poland have disclosed the gradual internal deterioration of the communist system. Some people believe that this process is promoted by detente policy; others--such as candidate Strauss--ask whether we should help these systems with credits. Isn't a dilemma for detente policy and Ostpolitik contained therein?

Schmidt: Our policy of cooperation between Western and Eastern Europe, as initiated since 1970 by our treaties with the Soviet Union, Poland, the GDR, the Quadripartite Agreement on Berlin and as expanded in Helsinki since 1975, has created more freedom of movement for many millions of oepole in Eastern Europe. Nobody regrets that in the West, least of all me. If that is the case, it certainly does not speak against our policy of cooperation, but rather for this policy. As regards the second part of the question, I say that Mr Strauss is wrong. The FRG as a state does not give credits, private banks do. They finance deals to make money, money that is also made in connection with all the trade with the East. I want to point out that the Bavarian economy has experienced an extraordinary upswing in the course of the past 10 years through orders from East European countries with which we initiated trade. I must point out to Minister-President Strauss that Bavaria is one of the largest importers of raw materials from the Soviet Union, such as natural gas. What Mr Strauss says in this respect and what you have quoted is mere polemics.

SZ: Must one not expect an intensified policy of limiting contacts [abgrenzung] by Moscow after the events in Poland? How do you assess chances for detente in Europe, particularly with regard to further detente in inter-German relations? Do you expect a meeting with GDR chief of state Honecker to take place shortly after the elections?

Schmidt: The decisive prerequisite for the functioning of cooperation between West and East lies in maintaining the military balance. That must be given priority. Soviet power is extremely significant militarily. It is therefore necessary that our Western alliance, to which we contribute politically, financially and particularly through our 500,000 soldiers and their first-rate training and equipment, always create a sufficient counterbalance. As long as the weight of the Soviet Union and the counterweight of the West are about equal, there will be economic cooperation as well as limited political cooperation. I have always presupposed that there will be setbacks and that there will always be leading communist personalities in Moscow as well as in Warsaw who would prefer limiting contacts and cold war to the present opening.

SZ: Does that also pertain to the GDR?

Schmidt: Yes, naturally. So it cannot be ruled out that some persons will now tend more toward limiting contacts. As regards the GDR, I am absolutely certain that the SED leadership under Mr Honecker, as before, is very interested in a continuation and development of cooperation between both German states. The reasons are obvious: The enormous economic strength of the FRG is attractive. Our main interest lies in exploiting economic cooperation for maintaining and strengthening cohesion among the Germans and particularly to give the people an opportunity to mutually maintain contacts. In the last 11 years we have made it possible for many, many millions of West Germans and inhabitants of West Berlin to visit their friends and relatives in the GDR or East Berlin unhindered. It must be our interest now to increase visits in the other compass direction.

SZ: ...Humanitarian alleviations. What do we want to achieve at the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference? Would a conference at the foreign minister level be justified for example, or a continuation of cooperation on that level in view of the continuing presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan?

Schmidt: It is not merely justifiable, it is urgently desired. I was the first, more than a year ago, to suggest to the governments in other European capitals to hold at least part of the Madrid followup conference on a ministerial level. Why? Because diplomats can speak only within the framework of their directives and instructions. Political ministers are more free in this respect. They can have private talks or bring up ideas in a small circle which would be much more difficult for diplomats to talk about or listen to. I believe that in the current dangerous situation in the world--and the danger will reach deep into the year 1981--I believe that in this difficult situation the West and the East must talk with each other even more. The danger of the Afghanistan war continues and the danger of expansion continues also. The danger of an extension of the American-Iranian conflict continues. It was extremely dangerous that the two world powers did not want to talk to each other from Christmas to the summer of 1980. I consider it an important merit of the French state leadership, of President Giscard d'Estaing, and of our state leadership, of Genscher and myself, that we have resumed talks. Secretary of State Muskie and Foreign Minister Gromyko will meet next week for the first time to get talks going on limiting missile weapons. I consider that absolutely necessary. I am very content with the fact that we initiated the willingness of the Soviet Union with regard to these negotiations, initiated it through our talks with Brezhnev and his Politburo colleagues.

It would be wrong to believe that politicians can speak with each other only if the result is to be a new treaty. This foolish idea is being spread in Germany whenever Eastern visitors are involved. Nobody asks such a foolish question whenever I meet with Giscard d'Estaing or Mrs Thatcher. So I consider the ministerial level in Madrid as necessary, particularly since there are difficult opinions with regard to Afghanistan. I said in a very clear speech to Mr Brezhnev and Mr Kosygin as well as to Mr Suslov and Mr Gromyko what I think of the invasion of Afghanistan. That was certainly much more effective than voicing differences of opinion in SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in the form of an interview, or in the form of a propaganda article carried by PRAVDA.

SZ: Isn't there a potential conflict here with the Americans, who obviously do not want a foreign minister-level conference because of Afghanistan?

Schmidt: I know nothing of that. Every government decides on its own who will head its delegation.

SZ: SPD Chairman Brandt said recently that without completing the process by having arms limitation, political detente will not survive. But only when detente is viable, in other words, when it creates confidence, is arms limitation feasible at all. Doubts with regard to the confidence-building effect of detente exist not merely since Afghanistan. What do you base your hopes on, as expressed in your recent letter to Brezhnev, concerning some progress in disarmament matters?

Schmidt: It is incontestable historically that there was no talk of detente in the sixties between the United States and the Soviet Union, but there was talk of arms limitation. The Nuclear Test Ban Treaty was concluded, for example, at a time when the word detente did not exist in America and Moscow. Other treaties followed in the course of the Sixties, on the Antarctic and the nonproliferation of nuclear arms. It was only at the end of the Sixties and actually in the Seventies that the leaders of both the Western and Eastern alliances began to use the word detente. There is a mutual complementing and enhancing that goes on, and if something goes wrong somewhere there is a mutual slowdown. I myself use the word detente relatively rarly. I speak of balance, of the necessity of maintaining a balance. Balance, on the one hand, and cooperation on the basis of balance, on the other--the result may then be called detente.

I think Willy Brandt is right that cooperation and detente will not work if arms limitation, balance in this field, fails. Then you will enter into an escalating race, and cooperation cannot exist in such circumstances in the long run. Balance can and must be stabilized through arms limitation treaties, and such treaties must be negotiated.

SZ: Balance is being jeopardized from various sides. Both candidates for the U.S. president's office have committed themselves to increasing American armament efforts. Are hopes at all justified under these circumstances with regard to success in arms limitation negotiations?

Schmidt: Much is said in election campaigns, not only in America but also in Germany. Not everything needs to be weighed too carefully. I read that Mr Strauss thinks that no invasion of Afghanistan would have taken place if he had been in charge of the government, but I do not intend to take that seriously after 5 October. I cannot take it seriously even today. I am certain that the American leadership, be it Carter or Reagan, will continue to be interested in mutual, effective arms limitation which will stabilize the balance. I am absolutely certain that this basic line of the current interpretation of American security interests will be continued.

SZ: The balance has already been changed in Europe. The London Institute of Strategic Studies has stated once again that the Soviet Union's lead has further increased with regard to missiles in Europe. How can the nuclear balance be reestablished in Europe through arms control talks?

Schmidt: You say that the London institute, which I have been a member of for more than 20 years, has stated it once again. The expression "once again" is correct. Years ago I was the first to term it a danger taking shape on the horizon. What is taking place today in the Soviet Union in the field of SS-20 arms--and they are mainly involved--is just the implementation of what I saw coming.

One must do two things: One must show the Soviet Union that one is willing and able in the West to create the necessary counterwieghts against these nuclear arms threatening Europe.

That was done in the first part of the NATO decision of last December with regard to modernizing nuclear arms in Europe. Second, one must tell the Soviet side that basically it cannot want an arms race, because the worse such a race becomes, the less the Soviet Union will be able to stand it economically. It must be told that it should be as afraid as we are that an arms race could lead to war. It must therefore be prepared to negotiate on bilateral limitation of nuclear armament in Europe.

The Soviets at first refused to enter negotiations offered in line with the second part of NATO's December decision. They abandoned their rejection as a result of the impact of the arguments by Genscher and myself in late June and early July.

SZ: Let us talk about domestic policy. Is the impression correct that two almost dogmatic lines are confronting each other? Regarding the maternity allowance, for instance, the SPD only considers working women, while the CDU and the CSU want to include all mothers in the family policy benefits.

Schmidt: They go even further and want to pay certain allowances to mothers who only quit their jobs in order to totally attend to their families and their children. At this point I will make a remark on principle. I am under the impression that some CSU and CDU politicians have the idea that it is not enough for the FRG to have 60 million people, that the population figure must grow and increase. This is an idea which regrettably still prevails in many states throughout the world. I think this is dangerous. When I went to school, in 1925, there were 2 billion people in the world. At present, there are more than 4 billion people, and in another 20 years there will be over 6 billion people, according to current demographic forecasts. Everybody knows perfectly well today that it will not be possible to provide enough energy for 6 billion people, it will not be possible to feed them in a way worthy of human beings or to give them medical care in a way worthy of human beings.

The decision on whether a woman and a man want to have a child must be made by them. But if they have children, society has a duty which must be excercised by the state and by its tax legislation as well as its social legislation. We meet such duties to a large extent. As of 1 February next year a family with 3 children eligible for children's allowances will receive from the state coffers DM410 every month in net terms tax-free. As you know, we have increased the children's allowances four times since 1975. We have also seen to it that a working woman who has given birth to a child not only does not have to work during the usual maternity time, which is 8 weeks as a rule, but in addition is exempted from work for another 4 months, with her job and her social insurance preserved and with the possibility that she can receive up to DM750 every month in net terms from the state. The social-liberal coalition will expand this type of family policy.

SZ: The CDU has again introduced into the election campaign the illusion of education allowances of DM400 per month per child for a period of 3 years. The alledged costs are DM3 billion annually. Do you consider this right in principle if we could pay for it?

Schmidt: You can talk about many things if they can be paid. But you used the proper term: illusion. Mr Strauss knows that he cannot pay for it. He wants to spend less money, as you know. Mr Stoltenberg wants to spend even less money. He should tell us where, for instance, he will get this allegedly more than 3 billion from.

SZ: After the experiences you had 4 years ago with your pension policy I am suprised to see the SPD promising a return to pension adjustment according to gross wages without any restriction. The FDP wants to tie pensions to net income. The CDU and CSU in their promises--not always, but sometimes--cite a general provision of economic development. Are pensioners not being promised too much prior to the elections?

Schmidt: The SPD is not promising this, it is the law. There are people in the FDP, for instance, who would like to change it. I have not advocated such a change. We have put pension finances in order. The reserve funds of the pension insurance carriers are growing again for the first time, not much, but still on the whole pensioners in Germany are better off than ever before. To give you an example: Those who in 1969 had a pension of DM460 and are still alive today now have a pension of DM1,100.

SZ: Can matters go on and on like that?

Schmidt: I did not say they will go on and on like that, much rather we dampened it down. Following the Bundestag election in 1976 I said roughly in my government statement: I am sorry I have to correct myself on one point here. At the time we anticipated economic developments which have not come about. We now have a second oil price explosion with all its effects on the world economy and employment. Wages have long ceased to rise as sharply as they did prior to the world economic crisis, nor will they ever rise as sharply again if I see things correctly. Therefore the increase in pensions will also no longer be as sharp.

SZ: All the parties are agreed that mothers are to be allowed at least one year of pension insurance for every child. The CDU and CSU even want to have 5 years allowed for every child born after 1985, which might result in pension claims by nonworking mothers. Isn't this also an example of the fact that the parties tend to create needs which then turn into claims?

Schmidt: I agree with you, only you should use the singular instead of the plural, not the parties but in this case the CDU/CSU.

SZ: Doesn't this also hold true to the same extent for the SPD?

Schmidt: No, I would reject that. The SPD has learned a lot from the wrong forecasts made in 1975-76. The issue of children who are not even born yet involves moving things into the future. The financing of these many children's years and baby years in future decades would be a grave violation of the recommendation made by the pastoral letter of the CDU and the CSU that the future must not be burdened. These are promises for the future which cannot be kept.

SZ: Haven't the limits of social expenses as well as of wage and income taxes long been reached?

Schmidt: Yes, I agree. Therefore, the majority in the Bundestag and the Federal Government have made extraordinary efforts to reduce health insurance costs. That has triggered great lamentation by many doctors. We must not allow the health insurance costs to rise further. The unemployment insurance premiums were higher under Adenauer than they are today. They have not reached a maximum level, but I agree with you that they, too, must not rise. A record increase in pension insurance premiums was achieved by two people. They were Messrs Katzer and Strauss in the late Sixties. They passed laws in the great coalition by which the pension insurance premiums were boosted from 14 to 18 percent over a number of years. Despite the world economic crisis we have not increased this premium in all these years. However, as of 1 January 1981 it will rise by 0.5 percent. But at the same time the wage tax will be cut considerably as of 1981. I agree with you that the employees and workers actively engaged in gainful activity on the whole must not be burdened more heavily. We also have to tell this to all social politicians time and again, no matter which party they belong to. One of the worst people is Mr Geissler, who has no conception of these things.

SZ: Everybody expects an election victory by your coalition on 5 October. I want to ask you the reverse: What will you do if you lose the election?

Schmidt: I do not answer hypothetical questions in politics. We are not going to lose the election, but the FDP and the Social Democrats will win this election jointly. The decisive question is by what margin. I suppose that we will win additional votes, but how many I am unable to predict. What would be much more interesting is the question of what Mr Strauss will do after he has lost the election. Will the great war a la Kreuth then start again?

REICHSBAHN STRIKE UNRESOLVED; GOVERNMENTS CONSULT

Mayor Stobbe Interview

DW240747 Hamburg Domestic Television Service in German 2030 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Excerpts from interview by unidentified reporter with Berlin Mayor Dietrich Stobbe in West Berlin--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The demands of the strikers bring up very difficult problems in East-West relations.

[Answer] That is correct. It is a wage fight in the Reichsbahn enterprise. The problem can be solved only in the enterprise itself, that is, between the workers and the Reichsbahn. I see no other solution. The strike management approached the Berlin Senat today with certain demands. We are the wrong ones to appeal to, because these people are not employed by us and we cannot help them concerning their demands.

[Question] But the Reichsbahn does not recognize wage autonomy or wage bargaining rights.

[Answer] There is one thing that will not work, and that is for the strikers and the Reichsbahn to claim that the Senat should solve the problem. We have a clear legal situation in the city. The whole thing is based on decisions made by the four powers in the immediate postwar times. This situation cannot be changed in light of the treaties and agreements we have, Nobody wants to change them. The conflict must be ended where it began.

FRG-GDR 'Confidential Talks'

LD231536 Hamburg DPA in German 1508 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn/Berlin, 23 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government in confidential talks with the GDR Government expressed its interest in containing the GDR Reichsbahn strike. According to government sources, Bonn said that an escalation of the conflict is not desirable. The Federal Government directed to the GDR its urgent wish not to extend the conflict. The West Berlin staff of the Reichsbahn have been on strike for 1 week.

Moabit Terminal Occupation

LD232026 Hamburg DPA in German 1905 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] Berlin, 23 Sep (DPA)--The strike situation involving West Berlin railwaymen employed by the GDR state railways deteriorated late tonight. The strikers expect to see the clearance of their sole remaining base, the container terminal in Moabit, by GDR railway police. A large contingent of West Berlin police supported by British military police arrived at 2100 at Moabit in order, as the deputy head of the British military police said, to protect the strikers. After the strike leadership decided to clear the area voluntarily on the advice of the British military police, the decision was voted down by a mass meeting of strikers. They decided to occupy the area until it is cleared by the GDR railway police.

Late tonight senior officers of the West Berlin police and the British military police were discussing their own actions in order to forestall the forcible clearance of the Moabit container terminal by the GDR railway police. The deputy head of the British military police said that it is not ruled out that the West Berlin police, on the instructions of the allies, might clear the strikers from the container terminal.

Statement by Strike Spokesman

[Summary] Berlin (DPA)--A spokesman for the strike leaders said this morning on the radio that the strike by the West Berlin employees of the GDR Reichsbahn would continue even though last night they vacated their last base at the Moabit container terminal. He claimed that the GDR Reichsbahn would not be able to supply the necessary staff in order to start the trains running again. He said that between 300 and 400 striking Reichsbahn workers have decided never to work for the East German railways again, and as these include many engine drivers, drivers of the S-bahn trains and freight yard personnel, it will be difficult for the Reichsbahn to make these figures up.

A spokesman for the Federal railroads said this morning that since midnight the GDR has accepted all freight trains from the Federal Republic, though he could not tell when they would arrive in West Berlin. Freight traffic in West Berlin is still completely paralyzed, and the S-bahn is operating only intermittently.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH JAPAN'S ITO, GDR'S FISCHER IN NEW YORK

LD231946 Hamburg DPA in German 1756 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Excerpt] United Nations, New York (DPA)--In the view of Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the warlike conflict between Iraq and Iran must be localized and settled as soon as possible. Genscher expressed this view today in New York during a 90-minute exchange of views with Japanese Foreign Minister Ito. Political observers assess the federal foreign minister's statement as a clear hint that any interference from outside would, as in the case of Afghanistan, be considered most harmful.

Before that Genscher had a 2-hour meeting with GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer. Nothing was divulged about the meeting, which took place in the residence of Bonn's UN ambassador.

Genscher and Ito also agreed that closer cooperation between Japan and the EC would be a considerable contribution to stability in the world. Bonn and Tokyo also want to step up their contacts bilaterally. Foreign Ministry Spokesman Juergen Sudhoff announced that Genscher would visit Japan next year.

OTRAG MISSILE FIRM TO HOLD TESTS IN LIBYAN DESERT

LD191240 Hamburg DPA in German 1100 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] Munich, 19 Sep (DPA)--The German missile-producing firm Otrag is to start its next missile test in the Libyan Sahara in October or November. According to the monthly periodical TRANSATLANTIK (Munich), which has just come on the market, the Libyan Government gave the firm permission for this 6 months ago. Otrag itself declined to comment. The head of the firm, Lutz Kayser, and the firm's spokesman, Frank Wukasch, were abroad.

Otrag, which was founded in 1974, had to stop its tests with so-called low-cost missiles in Zaire last year following international protests. Head of state Mobutu had cancelled the agreement on the use of a 10-million-hectare site.

After a 1-year enforced pause and the transfer of the development and production centers from Stuttgart to Munich, Otrag acquired a new lauching site in Libya "in the heart of the desert" south of the oasis town of (Jubayl as-Sabah) 600 km from Tripoli, according to TRANSATLANTIK. Lutz Kayser told the periodical that he had held negotiations with some of Al-Qadhdhafi's closest colleagues. Al-Qadhdhafi is a "very reasonable leader." His government is "stable and completely independent, because Europe needs the easily processed Libyan oil."

[Text] Paris, 24 Sep (AFP)--Iraqi Vice-President [title as received] Tariq 'Aziz will meet with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing tomorrow morning, an Elysee spokesman said. Mr. 'Aziz is making the trip to Paris specifically to talk with France's head of state, according to the spokesman.

Mr. 'Aziz, who is expected to arrive in the French capital tonight, is President Saddam Husayn's personal envoy, the Elysee spokesman said.

No other details about tomorrow's meeting were released. Mr. 'Aziz in April was the target of an assassination attempt for which Iraq blamed Iran.

Iraq-Iran War To Be Discussed

[Text] Paris, 24 Sep (AFP)--Iraqi Deputy Premier Tariq 'Aziz will discuss his country's war with Iran in a talk with French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing here tomorrow. An authoritative Iraqi source said Mr 'Aziz would "exchange views on the situation prevailing on the eastern boundries of the Arab world."

He had a 3-hour talk in Moscow on Monday with Soviet Communist Party Central Committee Secretary Boris Ponomarev. Mr 'Aziz pressumably asked for more weapons, though no details of the talks have been divulged.

PRESIDENT 'CLOSELY FOLLOWING' IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT

LD231424 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] It has been announced at the Elysee that Valery Giscard d'Estaing is following very closely, minute by minute, with greatest vigilance and also with utmost caution the conflict between Iran and Iraq. France will adopt a position only in the event that the oil terminals become paralyzed or in case of a blockade of traffic on the Gulf waters.

Government Calls for 'Restraint'

NC241153 Paris AFP in English 1143 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 24 Sep (AFP)--The French Government today called on the great powers to show "great restraint" concerning the Iraqi-Iranian conflict in order to favour a political settlement.

At the conclusion of a cabinet meeting, presidential spokesman Jean-Marie Poirier said: "France takes note that the difference at the root of this confrontation is strictly bilateral. France considers that it should be the object of a political settlement." Mr Poirier said the government was "highly worried over the consequences of the military confrontation."

The presidential spokesman stressed the importance of "complete freedom of circulation" in the gulf which France considered imperative not to jeopardise. He added that the French Government was in close contact with gulf region states "directly concerned" by the fighting.

Mr Poirier quoted President Valery Giscard d'Estaing as saying Mideast events were a "striking justification" of the need for the five-year-old French electro-nuclear programme, "which is progressively sheltering our country and our economy from certain exterior risks".

TWO NUCLEAR-POWERED AIRCRAFT CARRIERS PLANNED

LD231246 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] The Defense Council, meeting at the Elysee this morning, has decided to construct two nuclear-powered aircraft carriers of 32,000 tons each by the year 2000, to replace the Clemenceau and the Foch which were commissioned in 1961 and 1963 respectively.

MICHEL TATU PREVIEWS U.S.-USSR TALKS ON EUROMISSILES

LD221003 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Sep 80 pp 1, 8

[Michel Tatu article: "USSR-U.S. Dialogue--Talks on Nuclear Arms in Europe Could Start in Mid-October"]

[Text] Mr Reginald Bartholomew, director [as published] of the State Department's bureau of political-military affairs, speaking in Brussels on Tuesday, 16 September, at the end of a 2-day meeting of the NATO special consultative group, announced that "the recent development in the Soviet position opens the way for starting preliminary discussions on Eurostrategic weapons" between the United States and the USSR. These talks will be opened, he added, "without preconditions and in the immediate future," probably on 15 October. Before that Mr Muskie and Mr Gromyko will discuss this question during their meeting in New York on 25 September during the UN session.

The start of these talks was made possible when the Soviet leaders, receiving Mr Schmidt in Moscow at the beginning of July, abandoned the previously defined preconditions, namely that NATO should agree not to implement the decision it took last December to deploy U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe from 1983.

The 15 October date for opening preliminary discussions in Geneva has not yet been confirmed by the Americans--Mr Muskie is awaiting final agreement from his Soviet counterpart before doing so--but it was revealed by Italian Foreign Minister Colombo during the EEC Council of Ministers meeting in Brussels.

Indeed the important fact is that the two superpowers are resuming contact in this way--contact which has been almost completely severed since the beginning of the year--and that their two foreign ministers will have their first concrete discussion on this question in New York on 25 September--the first since their "contact" at the Vienna meeting on 15 June shortly after Mr Muskie's appointment to the State Department.

Are we to conclude that the Afghanistan chapter is closed? The Americans of course deny this and there is no question of lifting the sanctions which Mr Carter decided to impose in January.

However, it must be admitted that a large proportion of those sanctions, at least the most spectacular proportion, was removed when the Olympic games ended in Moscow and that the grain embargo will be difficult to maintain when the next agricultural season starts.

It must also be admitted that the decision to withhold supplies of U.S. technology is being ignored too often by too many allies (France recently gave another example of this by winning the contract for the Novolipetsk steel works, which has been given to Cruesot-Loire after Aramco and Nippon Steel withdrew) not to be doomed to slow erosion too.

Finally, with one crisis taking the place of the other, events in Poland have distracted attention from Afghanistan; the moderation so far shown by the Soviets in the face of the "Polish summer" has somewhat improved their image on the other side of the Atlantic. Moreover that image was so bad after the insults exchanged in the spring that it could only improve.

Several fairly inspired articles on the Soviet empire's "administrative difficulties" and the need for breating space have prepared for this swing of the pendulum. The Americans are also noting with satisfaction that the Soviets are still observing the arms limitations for which the SALT II agreement makes provision even though ratification of this agreement, suspended by Mr Carter, is problematical.

Another factor is the interest shown by the Europeans in negotiations on the Euro-missiles. The pressure for negotiations being exerted on this side of the Atlantic is still considerable--so much so that even a President Reagan would be unable to ignore it. It is probable that, if elected, he too would continue the 15 October negotiations which he would start with a view to modifying the SALT II treaty.

Indeed Mr Carter's administration will scarcely proceed any more quickly if he is reelected on 4 November. In a speech to a Congressional committee on 30 July Mr Muskie specified that the "preliminary exchanges" on the Euromissiles envisaged from that time would continue until SALT II's ratification; it is only after that stage, he specified, that they "will be able to lead to official negotiations and, we hope, to significant limitations of theater nuclear forces within the SALT III framework."

As Mr Colombo pointed out on Tuesday, the talks which will open on 15 October will therefore be "preliminary" and will only relate to the aims of the specific negotiations which will follow. This apparently procedural task is, in fact, considerable. It should be remembered that the Soviets want the negotiations to include all, or at least as many as possible, of the U.S. "forward-based systems," in other words existing and planned missiles, aircraft carrying nuclear weapons deployed in Europe or the Mediterranean and even the missile-launching submarines attached to NATO, although these submarines have already been included in the SALT agreements. They have also specified that any limitation which might be decided in Europe will only be applicable after SALT II is ratified but, unlike the Americans, they are prepared to carry out detailed negotiations before that date.

The Western stance on all these points is to be specified in the next few weeks because it was left rather vague by the NATO declaration on 12 December 1979. It indicated that negotiations should relate to "some U.S. and Soviet long-range theater nuclear weapons systems" (in other words the list was yet to be established) but its "immediate objective" should be to attain limitations on ground-based missiles only. That objective was reaffirmed in Brussels on Tuesday by a U.S. official who described these ground-based systems as "the most dynamic and dissimilar which exist in the region at present." Some experts would go even further in limiting the objective of the negotiations, suggesting a subtle maneuver--ignoring the 500 old Soviet SS-4 and SS-5 missiles which have already been "tolerated" for almost 20 years and are too inaccurate to be "destabilizing" and concentrating on the SS-20 missiles of the new generation: 150 missiles are now operational, of which 100 are targeted on Europe.

Let us recall that the United States is proposing to counter these by deploying 572 Pershing and cruise missiles which, according to them, will also be discussed. These more clearly defined discussions would be easier to conduct but it is very unlikely that Moscow or even Washington would be content with such a simple plan.

MARCHAIS SPEAKS ON INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT OF SOCIALISM

LD220907 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Sep 80 p 8

[Text of speech by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais opening the international tent at the L'HUMANITE festival on 13 September: "Democracy in the Full Sense of the Word Is the Aim and Tool of Socialism"]

[Text] Dear friends, dear comrades,

Allow me on behalf of our Central Committee to welcome you to this L'HUMANITE festival and to convey to you the fraternal greetings of all French Communists.

The opening of the international tent is always an important movement in our festival.

This year the international tent brings together an unparalleled number of representatives from communist and workers party newspapers and from the newspapers of other progressive forces on all the continents. We regard this as a sign of the French Communists' and workers' deep attachment to internationalist solidarity--the solidarity which binds peoples in their common struggle for freedom, a better life and peace. We also regard it as an illustration of the great changes which are now shaking our world.

The Characteristic Traits of the International Situation

The main events which have occurred in our world since our last L'HUMANITE festival strengthen our conviction that the balance of forces at the world level has now swung permanently in favor of the national, social and human liberation forces.

What are the characteristic traits of this international situation?

The developing countries have made their voices heard with growing confidence and determination. They no longer intend to be "looked over" forever. Their liberation movement has clearly become more mature. The aspiration to democracy which is now an essential characteristic of the peoples' revolutionary movement has been forcefully demonstrated. Tyrannical regimes have fallen. Others have been shaken by impressive mass struggles. Countries recently liberated from fascist oppression are confirming and extending--not without difficulties of course--their anti-imperialist line. Developing states are demanding more just and stable political and economic relations, in other words a new international system banning a neocolonialist policy, helping to stamp out the scourages of famine, poverty and illiteracy and to promote real development.

My recent trips to Latin America and Africa enabled me to assess the extent to which this demand holds a greater place than ever in the battle for social justice and democracy.

The past few months have also seen a serious aggravation of the deep, all-embracing crisis which is eating away at the capitalist countries. The workers are bearing the bulk of the burden. There are now more than 20 million unemployed people in the OECD zone. Social achievements are being called into question. National economies are moving toward recession. However, this crisis is sparking off bitter struggles. This can clearly be seen in a country like France where the past few months have been characterized by a major pusurge in class struggles. The Giscardian government and the employers have been forced to back down and this acts as a curb on austerity and national regression.

Finally, we greatly value the socialist countries' share in the world balance of forces.

Socialism has triumphed over an inherited burden of poverty and backwardness in a very short period of time. It can boast major economic, social, cultural and democratic achievements. It plays a leading role in promoting peace and supporting the national liberation forces. We think it is that which constitutes the essence of socialism's situation.

Of course the events in Poland--among others--are serving as a pretext for another campaign by the class enemy in our country regarding socialism's alleged "failure." We strongly reject this crude distortion of the situation in the socialist world. We do so in full knowledge of the facts and without trying to deny or hide the real problems which the socialist world in encountering.

We know that socialism cannot be developed without contradictions. The international situation has repercussions on these countries. The burden of the arms race imposed by imperialism and the effects of the crisis in the capitalist countries weigh heavily on their economies.

At the same time new problems have arisen--problems connected with the intensive development of these countries in all spheres--problems which need to be tackled immediately.

We are convinced that socialist society's progress and the blossoming of all the potential which that society contains depend on the introduction of bold reforms--economic, social and democratic reforms, the three being intimately connected. Socialism means and must always mean more social progress, economic efficiency, worker participation in public affairs, in other words, democracy in the full sense of the word. As we said at our congress, this is both socialism's goal and a means of its development--it is the universal component of socialism which we mentioned. Of course each people and each country must tackle this problem and solve it in their own way. There can be no model in this sphere or any other. In this connection I would like to add that we in no way underestimate the initiatives already taken and the results already obtained in various socialist countries.

It is up to the Polish people, their government and the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] and them alone to implement the reforms announced which will--we are sure--make it possible to overcome the problems and help strengthen socialist Poland. We are confident and wish the PZPR every success in this task.

Therefore we can see, dear friends and comrades, that the world is moving rapidly in the right direction.

Of course this progress is being made in the framework of a bitter and complex class confrontation.

The imperialist powers are sparing no effort to hinder the peoples' aspirations to social progress, independence and freedom. In the past few years they have launched an outright counteroffensive by reviving the arms race, turning the ideological struggle into outright ideological war and seeking a form of trilateral cooperation under the U.S. supreme command.

This desire to coordinate their efforts is encountering difficulties. That is understandable. The crisis, the erosion of imperialism's class positions throughout the world is aggravating clashes of interest among the monopolies. However, the essential thing is the will to move toward integration. It is this approach that we see in Mr Giscard d'Estaing's foreign policy which is fully part of imperialism's overall strategy. Moreover it must be noted that the PS is indulging in a positive attempt to outdo Giscardian positions as far as Atlanticism and national resignation are concerned.

A Great International Policy for France

The PCF's policy is entirely different. At their 23d congress the French Communists extended their strategy of democratic progress toward a democratic, self-managing French brand of socialism. At the same congress they defined a great international policy for France--a policy of national independence, nonalignment, peace and disarmament, cooperation and action to promote a new international system.

They are already playing an active part in the struggle for peace and disarmament.

This battle is vital today when NATO is trying to break parity at the military level in Europe by its decision to deploy new nuclear missiles on our continent; when the Giscardian government has advocated manufacturing the neutron bomb; when the FRG is now authorized to considerably increase its navy and when the United States is proclaiming a new doctrine of "limited nuclear war" which would doom Europe to destruction.

We are not intimidated by all these calls to battle. We are convinced that the broadest possible action by peoples can halt this mad race to attain excessive armament levels, that it can halt the escalation and impose moves toward detente and disarmament.

It is in this spirit that we, together with our Polish comrades, took the initiative of organizing a meeting of European communist parties last April which produced positive results and which met with a very broad response at both the national and international levels.

It is by contributing to the development of a broad movement of opinion in favor of peace that we intend to force the French Government to eventually take specific initiatives in the disarmament sphere and notably to take a constructive part in the Madrid conference.

Finally, we are anxious to take part in settling major world problems such as famine and underdevelopment and would like to see cooperation established with all countries without discrimination or ostracism, and we are taking many initiatives to promote a new international system.

In all these actions we are anxious to see France reject alignment with the FRG and allegiance to Carter, express itself in a sovereign way and take specific constructive initiatives in keeping with its vocation and its rightful place in the world.

The PCF's Internationalist Activity

These battles are an integral part of our internationalist activity. They go hand in hand with the close solidarity which binds us to all the forces working for peace and struggling for social progress and freedom.

Our solidarity goes to thepeoples who are building socialist societies in complex and varied conditions to the working class and democrats in capitalist countries, to the peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America.

It goes to the communists, democrats and trade unionists who are victims of repression in many countriesin the world. All those suffering attacks on their freedom anywhere in the world can count on the French Communists. Our newspaper L'HUMANITE is the daily platform for this solidarity.

As you know, we intend to see new relations of mutual respect, independence and noninterference, recognition of differences and mutual aid developing among communist parties and the revolutionary forces throughout the world. We welcome the fact that this new internatinalism is making progress because this ultimately adds strength to our common solidarity.

Dear friends and comrades,

In thanking you for contributing by your presence to the influence of our L'HUMANITE festival, I would like to ask you to convey to the parties and movements represented here by your newspapers the French Communists' fraternal greetings and our best wishes for success in attaining their objectives.

STATE SECRETARY COMMENTS ON NUCLEAR DELIVERIES TO PAKISTAN

LD232010 Hamburg DPA in German 1801 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] Bern (DPA)--Switzerland considers the quarrel about nuclear energy with the U.S., which has become public knowledge through American newspaper reports, as a "tempest in a teapot". The state secretary of the Swiss Foreign Ministry, Raymond Probst, used this terminology today during a press conference in Bern.

Probst confirmed that at the end of August Switzerland had been asked by the U.S. to comment on a secret American paper which talked about alleged new Swiss deliveries of nuclear materials to Pakistan. Examinations into this matter are now taking place on the Swiss side. After the conclusion of the examination, Switzerland will decide how the U.S. request for information will be dealt with. The impression in Switzerland was that the remarks in the American paper did not deal specifically with nuclear products, but with industrial products which could be used for various purposes. According to Probst, who until recently was the ambassador in Washington, the U.S. has not imposed a supply boycott on Switzerland, but has merely held back individual permits.

PUBLIC ECONOMY MINISTER ENDS TALKS IN NORWAY

[NORSK TELEGRAM BYRAA report: "Switzerland and Norway Agreed on EFTA"]

[Text] "I did not come to Norway to arrange oil and gas supplies on behalf of the Swiss state. Such purchases are made by private companies on the commercial market at current prices, which are considerably lower than other prices," Swiss Public Economy Minister Fritz Honegger told NORSK TELEGRAM BYRAA at the end of a 3-day official visit to Norway as the government's guest. Honegger has held talks with Trade Minister Reiulf Steen, who was his host during the visit, Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund, Industry Minister Lars Skytoeen and Agriculture Minister Oskar Oeksnes.

Honegger discussed both bilateral problems--of which there were few, he said--and also the role the European Free Trade Area, EFTA, will play in the future. In reply to a question, he stated that he and Steen had the same view of EFTA's future role. The organization, of which both countries are members, will have to proceed carefully. Relations with the EEC are best arranged bilaterally between individual EFTA members and the EEC, and EFTA will continue its role as administrator of the free trade organization's functions. Honegger had little faith in the idea that the European nations in the EEC and EFTA would together be able to solve the problem of unemployment. The differences between the nations involved are too great. He hoped that the Norwegian authorities would give the Swiss pharmaceutical firms greater scope for fixing prices for their products and called for more imports of Swiss cheese. Otherwise, he stated, trade relations between Norway and Switzerland were good.

CUBAN FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS WITH LEADERS

FL161020 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 16 Sep 80

LEADERS COMMENT ON CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING

Nordli Statement

LD191555 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 18 Sep 80 p 6

[Bent Ingen Bye report: "We Frighten No One From Open Debate"]

[Excerpt] "The government has a duty to state clearly its position on contingency stockpiling of U.S. equipment in Norway. But this does not mean that we want to frighten anyone from carrying on an open debate on this question." Prime Minister Odvar Nordli made this statement in an interview in [Norwegian] Radio's daily newsbroadcast yesterday evening.

Nordli said that he thought it was pointless if a government did not clearly announce it views. The prime minister also expressed the view that the question of contingency stockpiling had been overdramatized in various news media. According to Nordli there has never been any intention of presenting cabinet questions in any form to other forums. The prime minister also made it clear that he regarded the National Executive's resolution in Tonsberg as a guideline for the government's work and would keep to it, regardless of other resolutions that local branches of the Labor Party might adopt. But Nordli did not want to stop the debate on contingency stockpiling, and it would only continue anyway.

Labor Party Chairman Interview

LD230917 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 19 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] [Question] Has the Labor Party leadership lost control?

[Answer] The Labor Party leadership is not and cannot be an authoritarian arbiter of opinion. We want to have a party which shapes its decisions on the basis of debate and differences of opinion. A political party must both discuss and act, both consider and decide. Therefore, if we are to function, we cannot be some sort of debating society, where debates are carried on for their own sake. But decisions cannot be made in the form of dictates from the leadership either. The difficult trick—and it is difficult—is to find the right balance between debate and the capacity to make decisions.

[Question] What about permitting a single security policy issue to be put to the broad party membership, as the Oslo party has done? Is this a procedure to be recommended?

[Answer] The Oslo party itself must determine what best suits it. The Oslo executive says in its proposal that this is a small matter. I agree, but it has had the effect of triggering off an understandable anxiety which many people feel faced with the uncertain international situation.

[Question] Can the discussion we are now witnessing be seen as a conflict between open treatment by the whole party and the demand that the government must make the final decision?

[Answer] On security matters the government has a constitutional responsibility and in practice a very special responsibility.

Therefore a government, even when it is an unpleasant task, must have the strength to appraise and make decisions on important security questions. However, this does not mean, as Prime Minister Odvar Nordli has also pointed out, that anyone wants to hinder debate either within the party or in society in general. For my own part I would on the contrary like to see more continuous interest in foreign policy, security policy and international affairs. This is unfortunately not the case, and that is the reason why we in Norway have security policy debates in the form of explosions around individual issues.

[Question] Last year we had a debate on the deployment of new nuclear arms. This year we have one on contingency stockpiling. Isn't this a sign that the broad national unity we have had on security questions no longer exists?

[Answer] The fact that the question of the deployment of nuclear arms in Europe triggers off a debate is both natural and heartening. The arms buildup in the world has now reached such a level, and the tempo in the arms race is now so high, that ever greater numbers of people recognize the great need to transform the arms spiral into a disarmament spiral. It would strengthen the government's work on disarmament issues and the initiatives we will take in this field if the government had the support of a broad and aware public opinion. In the government's foreign policy the work for real disarmament negotiations is a task which must be given higher priority than any other.

However, if we are to be in a position to be able to take such initiatives in an effective way, we must ourselves feel a minimum of security. Our foreign policy must therefore be built on the balance between security and the policy of detente. Nor should we forget that the Labor Party as a party is very active in work for detente and disarmament. The Norwegian Labor Party is one of the most active parties within the Socialist International, and has made considerable contribution to the International's development in recent years as a factor to be reckoned with in the international community.

[Question] Could you have wished for better collaboration and cooperation between the grassroots organizations within the party and the government over the question of contingency stockpiling?

[Answer] As many people have pointed out, this is not a new question. We sent out the defense commission report to local party organizations for them to debate. The question is dealt with in the report. Contingency stockpiling of allied equipment has been a topic for debate at the two most recent national conference.

[Question] Do you agree with the prime minister that a rejection of contingency stockpiling means a change of course in Norwegian security policy?

[Answer] The prime minister has said that a rejection of the principle of contingency stockpiling would of necessity lead to a fundamental reappraisal of our security policy. Needless to say, I agree. Remember that contingency stockpiling has been going on since the Fifties. But this does not mean that either the prime minister or I have said contingency stockpiling for half a Marine brigade is a question of principle.

[Question] It has been claimed that the discussion on contingency stockpiling is in fact a power struggle between a right and a leftwing inside the party. Comments?

[Answer] The opinions within the party do not follow such lines.

[Question] Do you fear that this discussion could lead to a drop in the Labor Party's popularity in the next Gallup poll?

[Answer] I assume that all party members who involve themselves in this debate also do it out of concern for what best serves the Norwegian Labor Party.

NAVY SIGHTINGS OF FOREIGN SUBMARINES REPORTED

[Summary] The case of the foreign submarine off Utoe is now closed. The navy believes the submarine may have left Swedish waters. Here is a report by (Arvid Lagerkrantz):

"Every year the defense establishment notes a number of violations. In 1979 submarines were suspected on seven occasions. Ordinary vessels violated Swedish waters on six occasions and there were 77 violations of our airspace. So far this year there have been eight submarine incidents. The military is used to this kind of surveillance by the surrounding world. It may be one means of deliberately testing our military preparedness, of gaining information about coastal radar, artillery, sunken rocks and sea currents, and it may also be a means of training [words indistinct] submarine crews.

"The defense leadership thinks that the total number of violations shows how important the north has become as a strategic and operative area. Military activity is on the increase in the Baltic, they say. But the surveillance by the surrounding world is part of the game, and although one or two discovered submarines get a lot of publicity, this is not regarded as anything particularly surprising. It may be instead that the navy takes advantage of such as incident to indicate the need for [words indistinct]. As is known, the number of navy vessels has consistently dropped in the last few years.

"The fact that foreign powers are taking an interest in Swedish conditions is not really strange, but there may be big problems if, for example, a foreign submarine were to surface here in Sweden. It would then easily become a big political incident if a submarine from NATO or the Warsaw Pact was seized in neutral Sweden. And the defense has [word indistinct] instructions that the foreigner is to be turned away. The aim is not to catch the vessel. In a couple of cases the defense is reported to have identified by electronic means visiting submarines, but for reasons of secrecy we are not allowed to know who they are. The navy probably breathes a sigh of relief each time a submarine disappears unnoticed from Swedish waters, as it seems to have done this time."

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas has returned to Cyprus after attending the extraordinary meeting of the Islamic countries' foreign ministers held in Morocco. In an airport statement on his return, President Denktas said that Jerusalem was the only issue on the agenda of the meeting, adding that Israel's stand on this issue caused reaction.

Referring to the resolutions reached in the meeting on the Jerusalem issue, Denktas said if Israel fails to heed these resolutions, this will prove its (?intransigence). These resolutions are final. Recalling that the (?provoked) Islamic world was united in a bid to save Jerusalem, President Denktas said: Our wish is that Israel should adopt a stand that will permit the negotiated solution of the Jerusalem problem. If not, this will have serious consequences for our region.

Recalling that during his visit he had the opportunity to meet with other delegates, Denktas said that the Moroccan people and press had manifested an increasing interest in the Cyprus problem. Denktas added that the meeting had been very beneficial for the Turkish Federated State and that the resumption of the intercommunal talks in Cyprus elicited a favorable reaction from the foreign ministers participating in the meeting.

NC240912 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 24 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] Members of the Israeli secret service have been arrested and deported from Cyprus. This took place after it had been established that they were diving in order to search the cargo of the ship Zinovia which had sunk in the Larnaca area.

According to authoritative reports, the members of the Israeli secret service had all the necessary equipment and dove several times near the sunken ship.

After receiving the report on the presence of the Israelis, the Cyprus police put them under surveillance and ordered them to leave Cyprus after they explained their presence in the area of the sunken ship and their reasons for persistently seeking information about the Zinovia's cargo. According to our reports, the Israeli divers denied that they had been diving at the position of the sunken ship.

RALLIS COMMENTS ON ECONOMIC, FOREIGN POLICIES

AT211530 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 21 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

["Exclusive Interview" with Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis by contributor Stamos Zoulas, presumably in Athens; date not given]

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Y. Rallis believes that time "is working" for New Democracy and the current government is determined to complete--for the first time in the postwar period--the entire 4-year term. This conclusion emerged and was confirmed by many points in the exclusive interview which the prime minister granted to I KATHIMERINI.

Question: According to the constitution 1 year remains in the term of the government. What are the current government's prospects for completing the 4-year term?

Answer: As I have said in the past, in parliamentary democracies and under normal conditions constitutional order specifies that every parliament completes its term. Therefore I do not see any reason why the current parliament should not complete its term. I believe that the premature and unjustified dissolutions of parliaments irreparably erode the prestige of a parliamentary regime.

Question: In your evaluation, which are the most significant government goals for the period of time left before the next elections?

Answer: The most urgent government aim on the domestic front is the improvement of the economy and recent developments indicate significant improvement in the national sectors of foreign exchange, increased production, increased savings and containment of inflation. These favorable developments have contributed to the improvement of the psychological atmosphere. The entire encomic policy of the government aims to consolidate and improve this atmosphere because it constitutes a basic prerequisite for restoration of a balanced economy.

Nevertheless, many things have to be effectively dealt with in this area, for example, the strengthening of productive investments because only through increased productive potential and production will a reduction in inflation and an increase in exports be achieved. Our efforts also aim to contain expenses in the public sector so that economic resources can be freed to finance the economy's private sector and prepare the country to the extent that we can absorb the funds that are allocated by the EEC. I have faith in the dynamism of the Greek economy and for this reason I believe that these problems will be successfully dealt with.

However, I feel the need to note that the improvement of the economic situation must not make us overly optimistic so that we increase our demands because, in the 1970's, the Greek economy was tested by the shocks of the oil crisis and the international economic recession. We may possibly confront similar situations in the future and for this reason we must always be ready and must train ourselves to live with the possibility of a repetition of this unpleasant experience and its unfavorable results.

Question: What are the corresponding priorities in foreign policy at present?

Answer: In the field of international relations our foreign policy necessarily moves in many dimensions and seeks more goals than one. Among the principal goals which I must note is the settlement of our relations with NATO, our positive support of the course for solving the Cyprus problem and the continuation of the dialogue with Turkey. Regarding the first goal, it is self-evident that we have established it as a goal after taking into consideration the interests of Greek defense and the complete preservation of the responsibilities of the Greek Armed Forces in the area that interests us. For the solution of the Cyprus problem we maintain our clear line that the solution must be sought only within the UN framework through the intercommunal talks. Already the new phase of the intercommunal dialogue will be an opportunity to ascertain whether or not the other side seriously desires to make positive steps forward.

Finally, despite the change of regime in Turkey we have already shown our intention to continue the dialogue on outstanding bilateral issues. However, we still have to ascertain from future contacts with the new regime what its intentions are and to what extent there are prospects for progress.

Question: What are the Greek Government's assessments thus far concerning the development of Greek-Turkish problems after the rise to power of the Turkish military?

Answer: It is much too early to make any assessment regarding the repercussions that the military's rise to power in Turkey may have on the development of Greek-Turkish relations.

LENGTHY GOVERNMENT 'STUDY' OF BASES PLAN FORESEEN

AT201439 Athens I AVYI in Greek 20 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] McCloskey will conduct negotiations with the Greek Government on the question of bases on the behalf of the U.S. side. According to a U.S. proposal these negotiations will be conducted in Athens. This was stated yesterday by an authoritative government source which added that the U.S. memorandum which McCloskey presented to Foreign Minister Mitsotakis during their last meeting provides for conducting these negotiations "in stages." The first stage will be preparatory and then the government will proceed to concrete issues.

McCloskey, however, proposed an entirely different preparatory stage prior to the commencement of preliminary negotiations. This preparatory stage will coincide in time with the study of the U.S. proposals by the Greek Government and will supply explanations to possible questions by the Greek Government on specific issues. This will be done by American experts who might come to Greece for this very purpose.

The Greek Government has accepted the procedural proposals of the American side on the question of negotiations on the future of the bases but it lets it be understood that the period of study will last for a long time and that this study will, in any case, not be completed prior to 25 September when Mitsotakis will meet his U.S. counterpart, Muskie, in New York.

In reference to this the Greek side also stressed the well known position of the government that unless the question of Greece's return to NATO is first settled there will be no solution to the question of U.S. bases in Greece. In reference to the question of Greece's return to NATO the Greek Government demonstrated a spirit of controlled reservation which was strengthened after the recent Turkish developments because, despite the official statements of the Turkish generals, the true intentions of the military regime remain unknown. It is, however, certain that strong efforts are directed from the American side toward both Athens and Ankara for speeding up the process of Greece's return to NATO, a speeding up which the U.S. administration demands with increasing insistence on "logical concessions" from Greece.

I KATHIMERINI COMMENTS ON SPEED OF NEGOTIATIONS ON BASES

AT201522 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 20 Sep 80 p 5

[Editorial: "The NATO Issue"]

[Text] At first glance the position of Greece toward the pending issues of U.S. bases and the return to NATO, as it was presented to the United States this week, incorporates a conflict of interest. In accepting the new draft Greek-U.S. agreement on the bases from U.S. Ambassador McCloskey, Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis said the Greek Government would study it, he did not object to preliminary negotiations on the plan, but he did add that the prerequisite for the final signing of the agreement would be Greece's return to the military wing of the alliance which must precede any such signing. In other words the major stress emphasis of the Greek position is confined to the prerequisite as it was set, since the signing of the Greek-U.S. agreement and as a sequel, the existence of the U.S. bases on our territory, is under some dispute. Understandably, therefore, one could ask in good faith: Why is it that in this instance the Greek Government agreed to study and to negotiate--even at a preliminary stage--the draft of the agreement before the uncertainty over NATO is resolved?

At the outset it must be stressed that this position of the Greek Government, on the basis of which the two pending issues are inter-related, is not at all new. It was declared about 1 and 1/2 years ago by the prime minister at that time and the current president of the republic, K. Karamanlis. The declaration of this position was even accompanied by underlining the fact that if Greece does not return to NATO and if military cooperation with the United States should end, there are other "alternate solutions" available to meet the country's defense requirements. Consequently this U.S. insistence on hastening the Greek-U.S. agreement can be interpreted as a form of indirect pressure. It is indicative of Washington's insistence to speed things up that this appears after the initialling of the equivalent U.S.-Turkish agreement which opens up the floodgates for a spate of military and economic aid to Ankara.

The Greek Government does not appear to ignore or to underestimate all these facts. Yet, instead of a realistic and final interpretation of the U.S. position, the Greek Government also appears to be obliged to consider other factors which raise questions over its policy.

First of all there are the assurances of U.S. Secretary of State Muskie to Mitsotakis that uncertainty over NATO will be resolved within the next 3 months and that the Greek-U.S. agreement will be signed simultaneously. Therefore the Greek Government not only has no reason to reject preliminary negotiations but, on the contrary, it has every reason to cut short the negotiation period since the equivalent U.S.-Turkish agreement has already been initialled and since the goal of both Athens as well as Washington is that the implementation of both agreements should be simultaneous in order to avoid any disturbance of the current balance of power in the Aegean.

In addition to this, Washington's official assurances of a speedy resolution of the uncertainty over NATO were recently augmented by a concord in the American press which forecasts with increasing confidence the "good will" of the Turkish military regime toward a settlement of the issue.

In conclusion the Greek side is also well aware of the fact that the U.S. administration is faced with imminent elections and would naturally strongly favor a "spectacular" resolution of problems which will influence the decision of some three million Greek-American voters.

Perhaps all these considerations by the Greek Government seem based only on an optimistic hope about the final outcome of the current decisive phase into which Greek-U.S. relations have entered. It would, however, be much more dangerous and useless if the Greek position was adopted exclusively under the shadow of a negative view toward the latest proposals of the U.S. administration.

ULUSU URGES UNITY, PRAISES STATE PLANNING ORGANIZATION

TA231655 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Excerpt] The 20th anniversary of the establishment of the State Planning Organization is being commemorated today. A delegation composed of State Planning Organization officials headed by State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal visited the Ataturk Mausoleum this morning. The delegation placed a wreath and observed a moment of silence. A ceremony was held on the occasion in the afternoon. Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu addressed the ceremony and said:

[Begin recording] We are commemorating the 20th anniversary of the establishment of the State Planning Organization, which is a very significant state organization in the planning and coordination of our economic, social and cultural development. On this occasion I extend my thanks, congratulations and appreciation to the valuable members of the organization and to all experts and officials who have served in this organization since its establishment.

It is common knowledge that the world entered a difficult economic period in the seventies. The effects of this period are felt more acutely in developing countries. The economic crisis in our country is continuing because of the increase in world oil prices. The unity and solidarity of the nation is the first requirement to overcome difficulties at such strenuous periods. In addition to unity and solidarity, patience, determination, sacrifice and mutual trust are needed to overcome difficult phases in a short time.

The fact that our lofty nation does possess these qualities gives us the opportunity to improve the economy, to reduce the troubles of our people and to attain the level of prosperity which our nation deserves. Therefore, we will continue to implement the economic stability program--which is yielding positive results--seriously and with determination. The supplementary regulations of the program that have not yet been implemented will take effect soon.

The State Planning Organization must assume more responsibility during this difficult period. We are obliged to use our country's limited sources rationally and frugally. Efforts will be exerted to enable our public and private production sources to work more productively. Every measure will be taken to increase exports and foreign currency revenues, based on the belief that this issue is a vital one.

On the eve of its third decade, the State Planning Organization will always strive for the best. Our government expects all those concerned to exert every possible effort and initiative to enable our lofty nation to achieve as soon as possible the contemporary level of civilization as stated by our great leader Ataturk. I congratulate the 20th anniversary of the organization with these sentiments and beliefs, and I wish the continuation of its success for many years to come. [end recording]

REBATES TO UK FACE FURTHER DEBATE IN EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "New Rows Over EEC Rebate"]

[Excerpt] Strasbourg--Britain's Common Market budget rebates face further obstacles following a vote by the European Parliament yesterday to declare such payments part of the EEC's "non-obligatory" spending. Put simply, this means that the Community MPs have claimed a right to the disbursement of the money. This could mean that the allocation of the rebates might have to be preceded by a rebate in the Parliament, adding to the bureaucratic procedures which are already threatening to snarl up payment of the money.

Although yesterday's vote was separate from the failure of foreign ministers earlier this week to agree on procedures for releasing the money, it will add to the growing confusion and from Britain's point of view, bitterness. It has now become clear that, far from merely having the budget refunds--agreed last May--handed straight back to Britain, the British Government instead faces a tough fight for each installment of the 1,600 million pounds due over the next two years.

L'HUMANITE NOTES REPRESENTATIVES' COMMENTS ON POLAND, TURKEY

LD231145 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 18 Sep 80 p 9

[Laurent Sauerwein report: "It Depends Whether You Are Turkish Putschists or Polish Communists..."]

[Text] Strasbourg, 17 September--The European assembly meddles in everything. Today it debated events in Poland. "We must be cautious," Dutch Christian Democratic keynote speaker Penders said. The assembly was sparsely attended by some 40 deputies out of 410, which suggests that some people were upset to see the Polish people solving their own problems. However, there were enough preachers willing to overstep the assembly's authority and interfere in Poland's affairs. Speaking on behalf of French Communists and their associates, [PCF Politburo member] Gustave Ansart denounced this "insult to the Polish people."

It was quite stimulating to hear the Christian Democratic keynote speaker state: "We bear enormous responsibility" with regard to what is happening in Poland and describe the strikes which took place there as "fascinating." And it was odious to have to tolerate the speech by British Conservative Lord Bethell on human rights while Mrs Thatcher's government, which he supports, continues to arm the torturer Pinochet, and it was curious to see the interest shown by Socialist group chairman Ernest Glinne in the formation of self-managed and independent trade unions in Gdansk while trade unions are organically linked to Social Democratic parties--and hence to the state, since these parties are in power--in many European capitalist countries.

Unacceptable Interference in Poland's Affairs

"Many of those who are so enthusiastic here for the Polish workers are infinitely less ardent when it comes to defending the workers in their own countries," Gustave Ansart pointed out. "Workers who, like the fishermen in France for instance, cannot strike without being subjected to police brutality and state repression."

Similar examples abound in the EEC, the Communist deputy added. The EEC is undergoing a crisis in which almost 7 million workers are unemployed--which should prompt those handing out praise and blame on all sides to show a little more humility, especially since the European assembly has been refusing for months to discuss human rights in Community countries as [PCF Secretary General] Georges Marchais proposed.

There is no unemployment in Poland, Gustave Ansart pointed out, stressing how far that country has come and the considerable progress it has made in the past 35 years. "This rapid redeployment has given rise to tensions, inconsistencies and problems which the Polish Government and workers, and they alone, must solve," he added.

The resolution on Poland submitted by the Socialists constitutes "a flagrant, unacceptable and irresponsible interference in Poland's internal affairs," Gustave Ansart continued. He pointed to the "inconsistency" of this text which states that "the Polish people alone have the right to determine Poland's future" and, at the same time, offers "pretentious advice to a people treated as if they were children."

"We welcome the fact that people's Poland has found in itself the strength and means of settling serious problems in its political and national life without violence and by means of consultation and democracy," Gustave Ansart concluded.

Several minutes later Belgian Christian Democrat Tindemans did not hesitate to ask the European assembly to "systematically monitor the faithful application of the Gdansk and Katowice agreements." Mr Tindemans went so far as to mention, in barely disguised terms, the possibility of Socialist Poland's joining the Common Market one day soon: "We must never disregard the Polish people in building Europe and in seeking better forms of integration," the extremely pretentious former Belgian prime minister stated.

A Coup D'etat Was Clearly Being Planned in Turkey

The French and Italian Communists and associates submitted a blunt resolution condemning the military coup d'etat in Turkey. Calling for full freedom to be restored, the text demands the immediate suspension of relations between the EEC and Turkey while the military junta remains in power.

During the debate many speakers mentioned so-called "positive aspects" of the current situation in Turkey. "It is never pleasant to wake up one morning with the army on the streets," they said in essence, "but...." And British Conservative Scott-Hopkins claimed that "it was with many reservations that the army was forced to carry out this coup d'etat," while Mr Israel, a deputy who supports [RPR leader] Chirac, announced that his group would abstain from the vote on the communist resolution because it was "much too explicit...."

A coup d'etat was clearly being prepared in Turkey and some people had sounded the alarm, like PCF Deputy Georges Frischmann, who had visited Turkey with a delegation last May. "When I returned I was able to give a public account of the dangers which were then apparent," he pointed out to the European assembly today. However, the media and right-wing parties kept quiet. "Nothing could move them"; neither the state of siege, the attacks on the freedom of action of democratic and trade union organizations, censorship, mass arrests, police torture or even the thousands of murders whose authors were never disturbed.

"After yesterday's blameworthy silence we are now witnessing a strange campaign," the PCF deputy continued. The coup is being justified and people are expressing a surprising "understanding" of the army and are trying to moderate reaction to the crime in every possible way.

The resolution on Turkey submitted by the Socialist, Christian Democratic and Liberal groups does call for the restoration of freedom in Turkey and expresses the view that "the continuation of nondemocratic measures" would place the country in contradiction with its commitments to various European bodies. However, it does not explicitly condemn the coup d'etat. In Brussels the nine foreign ministers--Socialists, Christian Democrats and Liberals--said that they "welcome the assurances given by the Turkish Army," and announced that the EEC will continue its cooperation with Turkey....

GENSCHER ADDRESSES UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

[Text] UN/New York, 24 Sep (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher called today in New York upon Iran and Iraq to sit down at the negotiating table. Against the background of the dangerous exacerbation of the conflict between both countries he appealed in the UN General Assembly plenary meeting to all states to help prevent an escalation of the conflict by practicing restraint.

In his speech during the UN general discussion Genscher came out strongly against any hegemonistic policy and against military interventions because this destroys the peoples' right to self-determination. In this connection the federal foreign minister drew attention to the German-French declaration of 5 February 1980 in which the Soviet military intervention was described as unacceptable and in which it had been clearly stated that detente would not be able to stand a new similar blow.

Genscher said on the question of disarmament that detente and cooperation between East and West could prosper lastingly only on the basis of military equilibrium. This is understood as a reply to the speech by Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko who, in the general assemply yesterday, called for limiting the pact systems at the present level and for freezing arms [as received] as of 1 January 1981. In the view of observers he practically proposed putting a Soviet arms supremacy down on paper. Genscher opposed such theses by saying that striving for supremacy created instability and thus insecurity. Disarmament did not mean the conservation of supremacy but "the increased committment to disarmament for those having supremacy." He described it as the aim of the Federal Republic and of its allies to attain a balance at the lowest possible level of arms.

The federal foreign minister said: "We are concerned about the conventional supremacy of the Warsaw Pact in central Europe, and we are concerned about the rapid build-up of the new Soviet SS-20 nuclear medium-range missiles which are not directed only at Western Europe." Genscher said that Soviet arms endeavors exceeded what was necessary for the security of the USSR. In Genscher's view the Madrid followup conference of the CSCE should arrange a European disarmament conference with the clear task of agreeing on confidence-building measures for the whole of Europe "from the Atlantic to the Urals." "Trust is not divisible, nor is it geographic," Genscher said.

Genscher submitted three Bonn initiatives to the General Assembly for discussion. He submitted as the first a new point for the agenda--"international cooperation to prevent fresh floods of refugees"--and noted that in tackling the question of refugees one must also set oneself the political task of counteracting the causes for the flight and expulsion.

Bonn's second initiative submitted to the General Assembly is the establishment of a United Nations register listing the amount spent per capita on arms and on development aid by each industrialized country. There should be a second register showing worldwide arms exports and imports.

Thirdly, Genscher suggested to the United Nations that in view of the "terrible abuse" of the death penalty in many parts of the world there ought to be a convention against the death penalty. Only by banning the death penalty could this abuse be prevented.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BACKS BERLIN SENAT ON REICHSBAHN STRIKE

LD241438 Hamburg DPA in German 1354 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--The Federal Government supports the refusal by the Berlin Senat to assume responsibility for the Reichsbahn services in West Berlin which are run from the GDR, as has been demanded by the striking West Berlin staff of the Reichsbahn.

Government spokesman Armin Gruenewald told journalists in Bonn today that the government viewed the Senat's attitude in the Reichsbahn conflict as right, correct and appropriate.

Gruenewald confirmed that in contacts between the Federal Government's permanent representative in East Berlin, Guenter Gaus, and the GDR Government, as well as between the chancellor's office and the GDR representation in Bonn, Bonn's "muted attitude" in the conflict had been explained. During these contacts the Federal Government had expressed its interest in an amicable agreement. However, Gruenewald said that the Federal Government had offered no advice or recommendations to the GDR.

At the same time Gruenewald noted on behalf of the Federal Government in connection with the criticism about the GDR's behavior toward the strikers that the strike at the Reichsbahn has taken place according to rules which did not apply in the Federal Republic. The Federal Government has been aware of this the whole time.

Editorial on Strike

DW241100 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 24 Sep 80 p 4

[Editorial by Berlin correspondent Volker Skierka: "A Strike in the East-West Jungle"]

[Text] A railway workers' strike in West Berlin has reminded the public that the abnormal is normal in the divided city. Some 35 years after the war, the most important basis of existence is the occupation right of the victorious powers France, Great Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union. Without the occupation right, which was confirmed once more by the 3 September 1971 agreement, this city would hardly have a chance to survive politically in the power setup between the East and the West. For that reason the allies accept the continuation of anachronisms from the initial postwar year; a clarification would have unforseeable consequences for all involved.

To these anachronisms belong the operating system of the railways and S-Bahn networks in Berlin. When the victorious powers of World War II envisaged in the Potsdam Agreement of 2 August 1945 central administrations for the functioning of transport in all of Germany, the Soviet Union passed this task to Deutsche Reichsbahn a few days later with regard to all of Berlin. The Western powers accepted this without contesting it because at that time they assumed there would be reunification and they were interested in maintaining a uniform transport network for Berlin. It remained as it was and the Berlin railway system is now considered worldwide as an oddity because of its complicated setup.

The Deutsche Reichsbahn, which was taken over by the GDR after 1949, is responsible for the entire freight and passenger transit traffic between Berlin and the Federal Republic as well as for the S-Bahn traffic in the city. In the Western part of the city, however, it merely has operating rights (and thus operating duties). The allies have reserved sovereignty rights for themselves. East Berlin is the Reichsbahn headquarters. Its employees and workers in West Berlin are citizens of West Berlin, with a few exceptions. It is the GDR labor law, however, that is valid for these West Berlin citizens. Legal conflicts are handled by the East Berlin labor court. The Reichsbahn management accepts only the Free German Trade Union (FDGB) as a "wage partner."

For more than 35 years all involved--the allies, the Berlin Senat, the GDR and the Federal government--have moved quite well on this rugged track running through the tension field between East and West. They want to continue to do so and irritations are undesired. The strike by the West Berlin Reichsbahn workers was, therefore, practically doomed to fail from the very first day. After 1 week they had much sympathy but no negotiating partner, because the issue is so hot that everybody can only burn their fingers on it. The strikers are isolated because politics wants it that way.

First of all the GDR would not accept pressure on principle, even if the demands for material and social improvements were more than justified. In the case of the West Berlin Reichsbahn strike it would have been risky for the GDR because yielding to its Western servants would have certainly touched off considerable unrest among the Reichsbahn personnel working in the GDR. The Polish events demand in particular that the GDR Reichbahn directorate from its point of view must remain hard and prevail over the strikers.

The demand is simply illusory that the Senat negotiate with the allies and take over the Reichsbahn in West Berlin-aside from the fact that the Senat is the wrong one to approach. The allies are responsible, and they have examted the Reichsbahn/S-Bahn problem from the four-power negotiations because it could not be solved. The key word Reichsbahn belongs to those unsolved points which go toward making up the "special status" of the city. According to the Quadripartite Agreement, this status cannot be changed unilaterally. At present nobody is interested in discussing that ticklish issue, neither the allies, the GDR, the Federal Government nor the Berlin Senat--except the strikers. It is known, however, that the GDR would like to get rid of the deficit-producing S-Bahn. It is quite feasible that representatives of the Federal Government and the GDR could start a confidential dialogue on this matter in a few months. Maybe an acceptable solution can be found in an atmosphere that is free of emotions, a solution satisfactory to both sides and the allies--who would have to agree.

The striking Reichbahn workers who were actually just concerned with improving their living contitions will probably have to pay dearlly for their political naivete. They will get nothing and they will probably be fired. That can happen to one who goes beyond "the legal and political reality" in West Berlin.

SPD ISSUES STATEMENT ON IRAQ-IRAN CONFLICT

LD241932 Hamburg DPA in German 1643 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 24 Sep (DPA)--The SPD Presidium in Bonn today called on everyone bearing responsibility in the region concerned and beyond it to do everything to contain the warloke conflict between Iraq and Iran. The development in the Middle East threatens peace within the region and throughout the world.

All states would be well-advised to observe the same prudent restraint as shown so far by those occupying responsible positions in the United States and the USSR. The principle of noninterference from outside must apply also to the area of the current crisis, Presidium spokesman Schwartz said.

The statement adds that a policy of actively safeguarding peace could help in large measure to prevent in the interests of all mankind a war by proxy in the Middle East. In the opinion of the SPD Presidium it would be "extremely dangerous nonsense to follow the CDU/CSU advisers who want to send Bundeswehr soldiers to the Persian Gulf." This would inevitably conjure up the danger of widening the conflict.

The SPD also believes that developments in the Middle East constitute a threat to oil supplies. Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff said in an interview in tomorrow's edition of DIE WELT, which has been prereleased to DPA, that there is no "immediate danger" in this respect. The proportion of German oil supplies from Iran and Iraq is "not all that important". People in the Federal Republic need not prepare themselves for gas coupons. Minister Lambsdorff said he doubts that the Iranian Government was really serious in its announcement that it will close the Straits of Hormuz. However, if this transpired then national rationing would follow. For the moment, however, there is no reason for such "alarmist reports and nightmares."

Press Review on Crisis

DW250937 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Press review on military conflict between Iraq and Iran]

[Text] STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN writes: The numerous appeals to end the Iraqi-Iranian war were answered clearly by the warring parties yesterday: They continued their military action as fiercely as before. The appeals from the United Nations and the European Community will enter history only as footnotes, because the war in the Gulf, with its religious and power policy implications, cannot be ended merely with friendly words.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG notes: Washington has made it clear that it wants to maintain restraint. Moscow has pathetically announced its neutral stance. It looks as if each of the two big powers does not want to give the other even the slightest reason to become directly involved in the conflict, because neither side could tolerate the involvement of the other. The Soviets will want to avoid the risk of confrontation, so they could tend toward striving for a solution that could be similar to the 1956 Suez solution. At that time Washington and Moscow acted like accomplices. A repeat of such joint action would have several advantages for Moscow: It would make the Kremlin appear to be in the vanguard of detente policy and an equal partner in the role of top level referee. A commentator from a Brussels paper asked: What would happen if in the ensuing peace euphoria the Russians were to settle the Polish problem as they saw fit? Let us remember that Suez was followed by Hungary, writes FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG.

BERLINER MORGENPOST maintains: While America lacks an opportunity to exert influence in order to calm down the fire at the oil reservoir of the Western industrial nations, there is no need for the Soviet Union to do so. Where Washington can merely hope to keep its losses--and those of the whole West--as low as possible, Moscow can hope to be the winner in any case as long as the conflict remains limited. The overthrow of the shah by the mullahs last February not only eliminated a regime that was friendly to the West, it eliminated the whole American security concept for the Gulf region. Thus every further destabilization in that region will almost automatically work to the advantage of the bordering superpower.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG writes: Moscow's deck has been shuffled better, but it does not contain only trump cards. So the suspicion that Moscow might have triggered the conflict is unlikely. Motives for such an action do exist, however: Distraction from Afghanistan-Gromyko tried hard to do that in his speech to the United Nations--and hopes for deterioration in Iran. The Soviets do not like Khomeyni either, and they would like to see him replaced by a politician who has closer ties with them. Occupation of Iranian territory by "third countries" could offer them an opportunity in line with the 1921 Soviet-Persian treaty "to lead their troops to Persian territory" and to render friendly assistance in a change of regimes. Such an advance to a "warm sea" would not merely create a world conflict, it would have disadvantages for Moscow even before such a collision.

STRAUSS PRESENTS CDU/CSU GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

LD241126 Hamburg DPA in German 0938 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Bonn (DPA)--The CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor, Franz Josef Strauss, has reaffirmed that his first action following a election victory would be to pay an official visit to Washington. Strauss named this as the first item in an 11-point program for the first 100 days of a CDU/CSU government with himself as chancellor at a press conference in Bonn todsy.

He said that the relationship of trust with the United States had been shaken by Helmut Schmidt and must become as close and strong again as it had always been under Konrad Adenauer. Strauss stressed: "We shall make the Atlantic alliance so credible and capable of functioning again that the people will know that the CDU and the CSU guarantee peace in freedom."

The second point in the program, which he presented together with CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl, was the safeguarding of human rights for all Germans. The CDU/CSU would insist at the CSCE followup conference in Madrid that the GDR really put into practice the promise and obligations contained in the inter-German treaties and the obligations contained in the UN human rights convention and the Helsinki conference.

Strauss named as the most important internal political measure the fact that the new government would immediately draw up a balance sheet and reveal to the public the true picture of the financial situation.

Other points of the program for the immediate future which were mentioned by Strauss were the safeguarding of energy supplies through the speeding up of the process of approving new power stations and increasing oil reserves, preservation of codetermination in the Montana industries on the basis of the amendment he had already proposed to the supplementary law on codetermination, and a return to a pension based on gross pay from 1 January 1980 at the latest. The CDU/CSU program also evisages maternity grants for all mothers, a final readjustment of the law on conscientious objectors, a penal law with regard to demonstrations and a "practical" form of the right to asylum, whereby all involved would cooperate in a "concerted action."

APEL INTERVIEWED ON BUNDESWEHR PROBLEMS, NATO ISSUES

DW230926 Bonn DIE WELT in German 20/21 Sep 80 pp 1, 4

[Rubdiger Moniac interview with Defense Minister Hans Apel; date, place not given]

[Text] WELT: You have announced that you would draw up a major balance sheet for the Bundeswehr if you were to remain defense minister after the Bundestag elections. In those areas where money runs out the armed forces have to make do with what they have. Do the armed forces have to expect less and cheaper arms?

Apel: We will obtain the arms we have ordered, the present costs amount to DM55 billion. In addition, we must examine critically what we can afford thereafter. The problem of state debts is playing a key role in the election campaign. One cannot expect the defense budget to remain completely untouched if state debts are curtailed. But I am much more worried when making decisions for the Nineties--involving tanks and planes--that we make sure that we will be able to finance defense at that time. We indeed need to think "radically." It must be examined critically, for example, whether we will have armored personnel carriers on tracks, as before, or whether we will again be able to build a joint European plane with many, many billions in additional costs. The defense budget is not there in every case to safeguard keeping the German air and space industry busy. A whole group of problems exist in this respect, problems that urgently need to be decided on. The decisions must be such that defense capability and financing coincide.

WELT: Since the Bremen riots [against a public military induction ceremony] the firm impression has been created that parts of the SPD no longer accept the defense policy of the federal chancellor or the defense minister, or if they do then only grudgingly. What do you say to that as a prominent Social Democrat and as the relevant department chief?

Apel: I contest the correctness of the statement contained in your question. Young people and young Social Democrats as well certainly have a number of questions with regard to the internal structure and traditions of the Bundeswehr. We would very much like to debate that, but not in such a way that those asking the questions are both judge and jury.

We will have to discuss with them their own approach to traditions in their own units. If we want to conduct this debate seriously and frankly, we will have to sift the chaff from the wheat. Then only a few communists and creators of chaos will be left who talk about tradition, but mean the Bundeswehr and NATO. But we will face them full of determination. Our election program, which is valid for 4 years, clearly stresses that military balance as the basis for detente policy and belonging to the Western defense alliance are certainly [not] called into question by the Social Democrats.

WELT: Do I understand you correctly? You said that nobody in the SPD basically calls the Bundeswehr into question?

Apel: There are 1 million Social Democrats and among them may be some people who basically call the Bundeswehr into question. But that does not interest me. We decided unanimously on the election program I just cited. That holds true for all, as do the decisions of our party congresses. Those who believe they do not have to follow them must ask themselves if they are in the right party.

WELT: You have already touched on a ticklish issue this week: the decrease in the number of recruits in the mid-eighties as a consequence of the pill. Must those who are 13 or 14 now look forward to serving more than 15 months of basic military service?

Apel: Not those who are 13 or 14, because this problem will only come up by the end of the decade. But it does not make sense to keep it a secret that in addition to a number of other measures--such as more exploitation of reservists, more reenlisted and professional soldiers, maybe more cadres within units if that seems militarily advisable, as well as possible voluntary cooperation of women in the Bundeswehr in noncombat units (the Basic Law would have to be changed first)--a possible extension of compulsory military service could come up for discussion. We will make the necessary decisions in time and tell the young people that service in the Bundeswehr is service for their country, for their own future. They live in our country in peace and freedom also because of the existence of the Bundeswehr and because we are a NATO member.

WELT: Does in time mean in the next 3 to 4 years or earlier?

Apel: I cannot name a date, but I am very much against dragging issues on for so long that they become overdue. There will certainly be a debate in the next legislative period.

WELT: Former Inspector General de Maiziere complained in the commission report you requested about a gap that exists between too many missions for the Bundeswehr and not enough means. What can be done while avoiding a deterioration of the combat strength of the troops?

Apel: Some things can certainly be cut off, things that are not absolutely necessary for carrying out the defense mission. One must think "radically" in this matter as well. That is the main issue, along with some others, left over from the De Maiziere report. The leadership staffs of the armed forces branches are at work. I expect their suggestions early next year. The service burden of the Bundeswehr cannot remain as it is for the future. It would weaken motivation, among other things, particularly the willingness to reenlist or become a career soldier.

WELT: Complaints have come up repeatedly in the units that the superiors who deal directly with the recruits, the noncommissioned officers, have not been properly prepared to handle this "difficult generation." Will the envisaged measures suffice when it comes to the training of young noncommissioned officers?

Apel: It is, as always, a compromise. It will improve, but not everything will be fine. But I want expressly to defend the young noncommissioned officers.

Our young men come from a civilian environment in which most of them learn to shine their shoes themselves and keep their clothes in order for the first time in the Bundeswehr, to put it in a somewhat exaggerated way. They come from an environment where long debates on cooperation and codetermination are natural. They are not at all prepared to accept that an army must be structured differently, that next to the necessity of expanding participation and cooperation, there must be the principle of order and obedience. Not only young people have problems with the Bundeswehr in this respect, the noncommissioned officers who have the mission of training these young people have problems too.

It is therefore not merely a matter of improving the training of noncommissioned officers. One must tell the young people more strongly than before: You will join the army not because we want to irritate you, the forms in the army are not there to irritate you either, but because your service is needed for our country. That service can certainly be improved, I admit that. But in the end it will remain service in an army which cannot do without certain regulations because of its function and its tasks.

WELT: Mr Minister, the London International Institute of Strategic Studies in its recent analysis of the military balance between West and East points out that the speed at which additional Soviet SS-20 medium-range missiles are being produced is alarmingly high. In response, NATO made a decision last December to close the arms gap, a decision which has two parts. The first part envisages the stationing of 464 cruise missiles and 100 Pershing missiles as of 1983. The second prepares the ground for negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on limiting these arms. Which part is the politically and militarily more important in view of the Soviet medium-range armament?

Apel: The NATO decision was a unanimous decision. Frequently the impression has been created that just a few West European countries agreed to the stationing of American medium-range arms by the end of 1983. No, that was a unanimous decision. Belgium and the Netherlands still have to decide whether they want to agree to the stationing. I expect a positive decision.

The dual decision is balanced, both parts are of equal value. In other words, we want to negotiate. And negotiations are now to begin. We will leave no doubts that these negotiations are important, but that closing the arms gap will take place as planned if no results are achieved permitting limitation on both sides.

WELT: NATO said that satisfactory results must come about in the negotiations on the limitation of these arms if the deployment decision is to be revised. Will NATO decide what satisfactory means?

Apel: Naturally there will be negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union. But in contrast to the SALT rounds, coordination in the consultation mechanism is so close that there will be a NATO assessment in the end. It is too early today to say what will be satisfactory, but negotiations as such cannot guarantee the achievement of results.

WELT: Holland and Belgium as well as other NATO partners such as Denmark and Italy are not really fulfilling the 3 percent demand (increase in the annual military budget). The federal chancellor says that this is not tantamount to a softening of the alliance. What else is it if the defense ability of the alliance decreases?

Apel: There is need to feel concerned by a development that could lead to the alliance here in Western Europe becoming an alliance with unequal membership among West European nonnuclear partners. It cannot be the aim and intention of the NATO alliance that a few countries bear the main burden of defense.

We, the Federal Republic of Germany, do not want to maneuver ourselves into a special position, that would not be good for the alliance or for Western Europe. It is therefore important to talk very seriously to our partners.

But it does not make sense to do so in public. This must be done in the NATO bodies so that it will become clear that everybody must make his contribution, because everybody wants to continue the policy of detente. It can be continued only on the basis of a sure defense capability.

WELT: Do you have the impression that a sure defense capability is being neglected too much by some countries and some citizens in these NATO countries?

Apel: Many fail to understand NATO's dual strategy; it means a balance of military forces plus detente policy. Only both things together will produce security and peace in Europe. Those who see only the detente policy component ought to realize--at least after Afghanistan--that they are in danger of pursuing an illusion.

WELT: In conclusion, Mr Minister, a question that is somewhat ticklish for a Social Democrat: Events in connection with General Bastian and some rumors in the Bundeswehr make some people think that soldiers with a party membership book have better chances of being promoted. Is that correct?

Apel: It is not. I know only in exceptional cases about the party affiliations of those I promote. I am not interested in that. None of my state secretaries is a member of the Social Democratic Party.

For me it is important to mobilize competence and to tell the soldiers and civilian aides of the Bundeswehr: You can, if you want to, have and make known your political opinion within the framework of a broad democratic spectrum. That will neither hinder nor increase your chances of promotion. A party book army would be the end of the idea of a state citizen in uniform.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON IRAQ-IRAN FIGHTING

LD241240 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Text] The war between Iraq was discussed at the Elysee this morning. The French Government was due to make known its official position in the course of the afternoon. Here is (Arlette Chabot) live from the Elysee Palace.

[(Chabot)] Yes, the government did discuss the Iran-Iraq conflict and we have thus just this minute received the official statement of the government and even a statement by the president of the republic himself. Here, roughly, are the main points of this statement: The French Government expresses its grave concern over the development of this conflict. France notes that the dispute is strictly bilateral one and therefore concerns solely Iran and Iraq. In this connection it hopes that it will emerge and come to an end through a political settlement. France also hopes that other states, notably the great powers, will show the greatest restraint in order that this objective can be attained. The French Government furthermore reiterates that it will continue its consultations and contacts with the other Gulf countries.

On the subject of consultations, the Iraqi deputy prime minister will be here at the Elysee at 1130 tomorrow. This has now been confirmed. He will be received by the president of the republic. We will no doubt have more details then. Finally, the statement by the president of the republic this morning at the cabinet meeting: The president said that once again the events currently taking place in that region justify France's policy and electro-nuclear choice and that it is also a confirmation of this choice and of the approval of this policy made by the French people.

Francois-Poncet Comment

LD241006 Paris Domestic Service in French 0600 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Text] Iraq and Iran: On the diplomatic side, the great powers are playing things carefully and remaining neutral. However, one may note the standpoint taken by Europe at the UN Security Council; this is summed up by the French minister of foreign affairs, Jean Francois-Poncet, who spoke to our special correspondent in New York:

[Begin recording] First, Europe stresses the need to avoid anything which could add a boarder dimension to the conflict, notably to avoid the great powers getting involved in one way or another. And the Nine recall the primary importance for the entire international community of freedom of navigation in the Gulf, which is indeed--and everyone knows this--a vital artery. [end recording]

IRAQI PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL ENVOY ARRIVES FOR CONSULTATIONS

IRAQ NEGOTIATING TO BUILD FRENCH JET FIGHTERS

LD241051 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Sep 80 p 4

[Jacques Isnard report: "Iraq Is Negotiating With France on the Manufacture of 150 Alphajet Fighter Aircraft"]

[Text] Discussions are going on between Paris and Baghdad on Iraq's purchase of 150 Alphajet fighter aircraft which will be partly manufactured in Iraq. While these negotiations are taking place, Iraq will receive in November the first of the 60 Mirage F-1 air defense interceptors ordered from France.

Relations between France and Iraq in the aeronautical sphere started 3 years ago. In July 1977 Baghdad ordered 34 Mirage F-1 interceptors from France. At that time it was understood that Iraq would later announce an order for 36 new F-1 Mirages. However, in December 1979 an agreement was reached on 24 additional Mirage F-1 interceptors.

It seems that after buying 60 Mirage F-1s Iraq decided to move toward setting up its own aeronautics industry with help from French companies. After being dependent on the Soviet Union as their exclusive supplier for a long time, the Iraqis wanted to set up their own supply sources to reduce the risks of external dependence.

That is why Iraq adopted the broad outlines of a plan which never got off the ground. Indeed, a few years ago Egypt, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait had drawn up a plan to set up an Arab organization for military industrialization--with the acronym OAI--aimed at establishing the bases of an aeronautics industry in Egypt, which would have been financed by the other three Arab partners in the agreement and would have called on French involvement in the mass production of an Alphajet fighter plane intended for training local manpower and strengthening several Middle Eastern air forces.

The OAI disappeared after many difficulties, particularly after U.S. pressure brought to bear with the Camp David agreements which normalized Israeli-Egyptian relations.

Since then Iraq, for its own benefit, has reexamined with France the possibility of setting up aeronautics factories near Baghdad and at Al-Mawsil which would assemble the Alphajet. This twin-jet aircraft (note: The Alphajet has a maximum speed of 850 km per hour and is capable of carrying up to 2.2 tons of arms around 900 km) is of Franco-West German design, but the two manufacturers agreed that, as regards exports, each country would be free to sell teh aircraft, buying the jointly produced section from the other.

The order is for a total of 150 Alphajets in the advanced training version for completing the training of pilots who are not beginners and for giving ground forces tactical support.

The first aircraft would be produced in French factories. In the second phase Iraq would assemble the Alphajet's most important components in factories built to already approved specifications with French assistance. Eventually most of the aircraft's components, including the jets, would be manufactured in Iraq.

Aside from France, which plans to buy a total of 200 aircraft, the Alphajet has so far been ordered by the FRG (200), Belgium (33), Morocco (24), Nigeria (12), the Ivory Coast (6), Qatar (6), and Togo (3). Abu Dhabi is also negotiating with France to buy the Alphajet.

As far as the present case is concerned, the conclusion of a contract with Baghdad would break the Soviet monopoly in the Iraqi Air Force which is equipped mainly with MiG-21, MiG-23, Sukhoy-7 or Sukhoy-20, Tupolev-22, Ilyushin-28 and a few British aircraft which are already old. Iraq provides 23.3 percent of France's oil supplies.

Further Arms Sales

LD241520 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Summary] The Iraqi number two will visit the Elysee tomorrow. The Iraqi Army risks having problms on the ground with its weaponry, particularly with spares the Iraqis use, as well as with other types of tanks made in France. One may wonder, (Patrick Mersillon) [France Inter defense expert], to what extent they could be in need of new Weapons and if they will be able to ask for and obtain them from us?

[Mersillon] "The Iraqis have been interested in French weapons for economic reasons so they need no longer depend entirely on the USSR.

It is interesting to take stock of deliveries since there is a certain amount of confusion in the press on this subject. The 60--not 36--Mirage F-1 aircraft ordered from Dassault have not been delivered yet. The first two models will not be sent until November. Iraq has not bought about 100 AMX-30's as falsely reported by the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. The only French equipment currently in service in Iraq consists of AML-Panhard armored vehicles; Alouette-III, Gazelle, Puma and Super-Frelon helicopters; and HOT antitank missiles mounted on VCR-Panhard vehicles and on Gazelle helicopters. The war will certainly not last long enough to justify an acceleration of French arms deliveries which, moreover, would be interpreted as being a too direct commitment by France to Iraq. This visit by Tariq 'Aziz thus seems to have a positive and diplomatic motive behind it rather than a purely military one.

LE MONDE ON SUPERPOWER STAKES IN IRAN-IRAQ WAR

[Editorial: "The Superpowers' Anxiety"]

[Text] Wars between their vassals or clients in the Third World only pose one problem for Washington and Moscow: to what extent should they be supported by carefully controlled arms supplies? When should these supplies be stopped? The confrontation between Iraq and Iran makes the question singularly more complex and, aside from the necessary calls for calm to be restored, is causing obvious perplexity both in the United States and the USSR. That explains the marked absence of reactions which would be more energetic and sometimes virulent on other occasions.

It is diffucult for Moscow to choose between Imam Khomeyni's Iran, which is above all anti-American, and the Iraqi ally which is now reticent and increasingly open to Western influences. In 1977 in the Somali-Ethiopian conflict the Soviets were forced to take sides, favoring a new but powerful friend and writing off the treaty of friendship and cooperation they had signed with Mogadishu, which was abandoned to the "imperialists." At least Moscow knew which country had the most power in the Horn of Africa. It would be much more annoying to alienate one of the two warring oil giants even although the Iranian chaos is, ultimately, promising, and Iraq is still, at least officially, "committed to the socialist path." However, under violent attack from Tehran for having continued to supply arms to Baghdad, the USSR is discreetly leaving us to guess which camp it prefers.

In Washington the readily understandable hope of seeing Imam Khomeyni's hostile regime fall is tempered by various considerations which call for caution. Nobody knows what would happen to the U.S. hostages if Iran were to collapse--a collapse for which the hostages could well pay. Tehran's military collapse could pave the way for a new Soviet thrust should an intervention by the powerful neighbor become necessary. A "lesson" inflicted on Imam Khomeyni, provided it does not lead to disaster, will in any case show the Iranian Army that a complete break with the "Great Satan" is not without repercussions on the country's armaments and security.

By recognizing in an extremely conciliatory tone the "reality of the Iranian revolution" just when it is threatened from outside and by confirming that the settlement of the hostage question and the current conflict are "separate," U.S. Secretary of State Muskie is looking ahead. He also intends to rule out the "Iraqi-U.S. collusion" hypothesis, although the fact that Saudi Arabia--a U.S. ally--was warned of Mr Saddam Husayn's warlike intentions gives some credence to this.

Influenced by different ulterior motives and, most probably, unsure as to what path to follow on a crisis which is not under thier control, the Americans and Soviets are ultimately singing the same hymn to moderation. They know that if the conflict degenerates into a large-scale war, as can be feared from the threat to the world's main oil supply route, the global consequences of a longstanding quarrel will be out of all proportion to the dispute between Imam Khomeyni and President Saddam Husayn.

L'HUMANITE CITES POLISH ACHIEVEMENTS UNDER SOCIALISM

LD220717 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 4 Sep 80 pp 1, 8

[Andre Wormser article: "The Question"]

[Text] A radio commentator denied Goerges Marchais the right to "rejoice" after the peaceful settlement of the Polish strikes and cleverly asked this question: "Was socialist Poland's overall record positive before or after the strikes?" It is only natural for anticommunists to be worried about the advance of democracy in a country without billionaires, without a stock exchange, without unemployed people and whose enormous economic difficulties are in no way representative of the situation in the socialist world. The "freedom" which, according to U.S. economists, an increasing number of unemployed people will enjoy in the capitalistcountries in the next 15 years bears little relations to democracy! However, the fact that the subtle commentator is asking such a question shows that, although he knows who he has to attack, he does not know what he is talking about. For instance, and this is strange, he does not know that Polish emigration was not so high under the colonels' regime because the standard of living in Poland was marvelous! He does not know that in the blessed days of capitalism, many Warsaw citizens bought bundles of straw on which they slept in the streets. I saw that. He does not know that the Germans did not found the Warsaw ghetto: They simply walled it in.

He does not know, or he has forgotten, that socialism inherited a country which was ravaged, ruined, demoralized and which—like the GDR—no longer had a capital. Warsaw and Berlin were totally destroyed (only 30 percent of Budapest was destroyed!) Can anybody imagine what it would have been like if liberated France had had Paris to rebuild? And Poland was a poor country! He does not know that Gdansk was nonexistent—and that the old port had its 17th and 18th century houses rebuilt as they had been—a fantastic and enormously expensive operation! He does not know, has forgotten or prefers not to remember that this enormous rebuilding job was carried out without the help of U.S. capital, that Hungary, Slovakia, but above all Poland and, even more, East Germany had been crossed by the war from end to end and that the only great power which could help them was the Soviet Union, many of whose cities had experienced the same fate as Warsaw, Berlin and Gdansk.

So, from 1945 to 1980, before or after the strikes, socialism's contribution has certainly been positive in Poland and everywhere that socialism has dressed wounds and built a new life. That does not mean that socialism immediately settled all problems everywhere or that its leaders are infallible or that people's minds can be changed as quickly as capital cities can be rebuilt, but you have to be terribly unaware to ask a question like that.

However, let us ask in our turn whether, in view of unemployment, inflation, destruction of industrial potential, bankruptcies, the ruin of small enterprises, even considering the growth of capitalist profit which is very satisfying—for them—our commentator will tell us whether he considers Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing's record as generally positive before or after the fishermen's strike?

PCF'S FISZBIN CRITICIZES PARTY ELECTION STRATEGY

LD241447 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] PCF Paris Federation Bureau member Henri Fiszbin, former Paris Federation first secretary, sent a letter to the PCF Central Committee Secretariat on 19 September in which he states: "I have read Georges Marchais' book and his speech at the L'HUMANITE festival which lays down the content of the party's strategy for the presidential election. This line is not in keeping with the needs of the battle for real change which we should be waging. It offers no immediate prospects for the mass of French people suffering the effects of Giscard's policy. It breaks with the strategy laid down by our 22d and 23d congresses. It has been adopted without first being submitted for discussion in the party.

He added: "The path to which the party is being committed seems to me to have extremely serious consequences for the present and the future of the workers and democratic movement in our country and for the party itself. My responsibilities within the party make it my duty to express the reasons for my anxiety.

"In addition it is inconceivable that the national conference which will be held on 11 and 12 October could approve this line without a real fundamental debate. However, the party's current policy is not to allow Communists who do not approve of major political options taken by the leadership to represent their federal committees. That is why I am asking the Central Committee to invite me to the national conference with a consultative vote—a possibility for which article 44 of our rules makes provision."

MITTERRAND COMMENTS ON PCF TIES, MICHEL ROCARD ROLE

LD231435 Paris LE MATIN in French 15 Sep 80 p 4

[Alexis Liebaert report: "Mitterrand: The PS Will Not Negotiate Between the Two Rounds of the Election"]

[Text] Yesterday was a day of explanations for Francois Mitterrand. While visiting the Mediterranean rally organized by the PS at Saint-Maximin (Var), he took advantage of an interview on France Inter's 1300 hours news program to reply to the speech made by Georges Marchais on Saturday and also to [PS assembly group member]—Edgard Pisani who stated that the PS first secretary was going to "hand over" power to Michel Rocard.

Because of the current situation it is what Francois Mitterrand said about the French situation which stands out from the statements he made when he came to Saint-Maximin yesterday to attend the last day of the PS Mediterranean rally. "Enough has been done to worry our people. Enough has been done to dishearten those who want to see the right ousted." It was in those terms that he replied to statements made by Georges Marchais the previous day. He immediately specified that it was not the Socialists who had done this.

With a polemical remark he explained that the PCF secretary general's tirades "do not haunt" him and that "allowances" must be made for a candidate who feels he "must lay it on thick" to snatch 0.25 of a point in the opinion polls. However, above all, the PS first secretary, questioned on possible PCF-PS negotiations between the two rounds of the election and on a possible refusal of Communist support, explained: "Stepping down in favor of another candidate cannot be negotiated. Either there is an agreement from the first round—which is desirable—or else we play the people's forces' legitimate game against the ruling class. The PS has nothing to fear on that score. It will not negotiate under threat."

The other explanation given that day concerned Edgard Pisani who stated that Francois Mitterrand was going to "hand over" to Michel Rocard. According to the PS first secretary that statement may have extended "beyond the 1981 presidential election." He stated: "It seemed to refer to my political activity in general. I think that is why many Socialists took note of it. I think many Socialists do not want that." On this point he concluded: "Everybody fulfills a function in society. Edgard Pisani's function is to regularly deliver my funeral oration from the television platform which the government lends him."

Francois Mitterrand was more concentional in the foreign policy sphere—which was to be the subject of his speech that evening in Marseilles. After stressing the importance he attaches to the "Euro-Arab-African" dialogue he spoke at length and emphatically on the need for dialogue between adversaries and warring factions. He also argued with conviction in favor of the forthcoming Madrid CSCE conference and for SALT II talks on disarmament. Francois Mitterrand explained his attachment to these dialogue structures in one sentence: "We really are sitting on a power keg."

SA CARNEIRO DEFENDS GOVERNMENT RECORD

[Excerpts] "The government will do its utmost to ensure that the election campaign is entirely free, unconstrained and impartial," the prime minister told the country yesterday in an impromptu 55-minute radio and television address. Describing the 5 October elections as "decisive and crucial to our country's future," Sa Carneiro outlined in his talk a general picture of the importance of the executive's activity during its 8 months in government. With reference to agriculture he said that "we have put an end to the revolutionary agrarian reform."

"The election campaign is about to about to begin, and during it I will not speak as the prime minister because I will be involved as the Social Democratic Party [PSD] chairman and as a parliamentary candidate. This is why, though the government will remain in charge until the end of its term of office, I feel it opportune now to give a brief general assessment of the government's activity. I do not intend to list all the measures taken by the government or even its policies in the various sectors: The public knows them; the various ministers have been in contact with the public and so too has the Council of Ministers itself," Sa Carneiro began. Next he pointed to "the situation experienced before the 2 December election, before this government was formed--a situation in which he had governments which lasted an average of 6 months and in which there was lamentably a general lack of faith among the Portuguese people in democracy itself, or rather in the actual ability of the democratic system to find an answer to unkept promises, undiscovered solutions and unresolved difficulties, which created widespread disorientation and in which there was little hope."

Next Sa Carneiro stressed that "the Portuguese people gave us the parliamentary majority on 2 December, and it is on the basis of this majority that we exercise power, shoulder our responsibility and pursue our policy. And now I believe that everyone will acknowledge that the former situation has been entirely changed." He added that "whether or not you like the government's policy and whether or not you agree with it, there is a government, there is a policy, there is renewed confidence in the institutions and in the future and there are also specific results." Having stressed that "the government has never accused anyone, persecuted anyone or attached anyone because it has managed to exercise power within the limits of democracy, demanding observance of the democratic rules," he pointed out that "nevertheless, the government has been opposed by not entirely democratic bodies, hence the reason for certain conflicts and attacks against it."

Having stated that "we were a government of Portuguese for the Portuguese and not a government of the parties for the parties or for individual interests, a government whose prime concern was the real nation that we are, the Portuguese mainland, island and communities supported by the world," Sa Carneiro added: "We are not a land rich in resources, but we are a great people, we have a great language and a culture, society and people of merit and ability, and it was this that we always bore in mind, together with the delays with respect to other European countries which constitute the nation's problems."

Stating that his government "was also a government of state," he explained that this means that "it did not concern itself with the interests of individual sectors or classes" and added that it was also "a united government in which there was no talk of parties but only of specific issues, possibilities and achievements, ministry by ministry." "Of the major difficulties which this government may have encountered," he said, "the first was the lack of time in which it had to govern; second, the difficulty of the international economic situation--a time of recession, whose effects are being felt throughout Europe and throughout the world." In this connection he pointed out that "at the end of last year we witnessed one of the greatest ever increases in oil prices, an increase of over 130 percent, more than double" and that this placed a large burden on the country.

Another of the great difficulties that the government had to face, Sa Carneiro said, was "the country's lack of financial resources and the economic structure, for which we are not responsible but which we did have to manage and which unfortunately we were unable to alter within the terms of the present constitution, owing to the opposition of another of the state bodies."

He stressed that "we found our country in an unfair and difficult economic and social situation. Before, the state was spending more and more. It was spending more and more to feed its machinery while the citizens, on the other hand, were earning less and less and state spending, being in the form of consumption, did not constitute an investment in the future or in creating wealth; it served merely to maintain services." He mentioned "the decline in purchasing power," "price increases, inflation, which just last year topped 24 percent and which was eroding real earnings and pensions--inflation and price increases which are not just an economic, but above all a social enemy." He added with regard to unemployment "that it was constantly increasing."

In view of "such a grave situation," Sa Carneiro said that "despite other equally important areas, it was here, basically, that the government centered its action in as thorough and rapid an attack as possible so as to achieve the results which, despite the little time available, are already visible and which the Portuguese people are already feeling, though they do not yet meet our needs and are just a beginning. In the first 7 months of this year prices increased 6.9 percent as against 11 percent in the first 7 months last year, and we are now sure that we will reach the end of the year with a total increase in prices, an inflation rate, of 15-16 percent. This is a large drop from last year's 24.2 percent." He pointed out that "Europe now has an average inflation rate of 14-15 percent. Our 15-16 percent inflation rate means that for the first time in many years people's real earnings in Portugal will increase; salaries and pensions will increase 21 percent on average, without taking into account the latest increase granted by the government." "At the same time," he said, "we have lowered taxes and people have received rebates for past overpayments since January." "The specific result of all this in practice has been that everyone has been able to increase his purchasing power a little," he concluded.

Discussing the creation of wealth and particularly its improved distribution, Sa Carneiro said that "by means of a better distribution of public resources and also the rigorous collection of tax revenue and welfare contributions, the government has managed to introduce widespread increases in benefits, especially for the underprivileges, and quite rightly so. At the same time the government was pursuing a policy of public austerity." He pointed out that "in the past there has been much talk about this austerity, which the citizens were urged to show in exchange for the promise of a better future, whereas this government believes that it should first be demanded from and initiated by the state itself, and this is why we limited state spending which has not increased in real terms. Through this policy we have managed to decrease inflation and to continue the growth of the economy. This is in fact very difficult to achieve, but we have achieved it.

"Last year there was no growth in the economy: There was what economists regard as zero growth, but this year there will be a 7-percent increase in investment, and we need to continue increasing this figure until we reach 10 percent."

Next he said that "this year will show an increase in GNP of about 4 percent, which is higher than first forecast."

He continued as follows: "Let us consider also, with regard to industrial policy, the introduction of new investments which have been reflected in new jobs and greater wealth, many of them examined before but without the decisiveness needed for their implementation." Among these new investments he singled out the exploitation of mineral resources, "which we do have and which, though not very abundant, are very valuable and have been underexploited if not forgotten."

Next he discussed social policy, emphasizing "the rapid formulation of social pacts and labor contracts," adding that "we did not impose pay increases, we did not introduce the pay ceiling that applied in the past, and we have allowed negotiations to take place so that a result could be achieved." He pointed out that "there have been strikes, of course, just as there are strikes throughout Western Europe and in any free or democratic society, since they fail to occur only in societies without free trade unions and where those who demand them are crushed, as we have seen in recent events. But even so strikes this year have been below the European norm and fewer than in previous years.

"There was not the general paralysis with which we were threatened, precisely because the workers realized what was happening in national policy and industrial policy and did not allow themselves to be manipulated, irrespective of their political stances, and merely defended their interests and tried to find a solution with their bosses." Thus, Sa Carneiro said, "the government's economic and social policy has made it possible to create the conditions, formerly lacking, so that the social partners can, if they want, in the future form a social pact or a social contract."

Continuing with his impromptu speech, Sa Carneiro said that cultural and educational issues also constituted problems for this government. "So too did the interests of the farming world in its attachment to the land, which has been ignored, its attachment to property and private initiative viewed as personal scope for freedom, as a means for self-fulfillment and social progress, as we Portuguese have always instinctively viewed it and have always defended it," he said.

Next he said that "here in this field we have pursued a real agricultural policy and not, as in the past, a politico-agricultural policy, if you will pardon the expression. We have put an end to the revolutionary agrarian reform, which was an ideological and political agrarian reform dependent on partisan influences and which the government before ours assumed that it could not resolve without yielding to partisan forces, without political and ideological compromises, in a situation which lent no prestige to agriculture or the state and which was not consistent with the law. But we did observe the law and did so with complete impartiality, without confrontations. And we managed to do so by restoring the reserves [land formerly expropriated], bringing the previous era to an end, distributing land to the rural workers and to independent farmers. For this reason I visited the Alentejo several times, and with great pleasure, because the Alentejo is part of Portugal and regards itself and wants to be treated as part of a free and democratic Portugal not manipulated by the action of any partisan forces; and this is how the rest of the country wants to see it treated and regarded."

Next he explained that the government has handed over to 950 rural workers a total of 20,800 hectares of land, rectifying the situation regarding rural property and embracing 400 small farmers, and that a plan for restoring reserves "as required by law" has been carried out. "In this, as in the industrial field, compensations have still to be paid, but in the nonagricultural field we have already taken steps in this direction and compensation documents are being issued, as in the case of the investment funds," he said.

Next the prime minister analyzed the government's foreign policy, stressing that "it has always been handled with an eye to the country's interests." Its foreign policy has been "the policy of a government aware of its position in the country and aware that it has been endorsed and which therefore does not delegate its powers to other state bodies, when these belong to the government. Thus, we adopted steadfast positions to deal with the dangers to the West created by imperialist power, which also threaten us but at the same time embracing the positive side of foreign policy—creating and developing relations and ties in all political and economic fields."

Sa Carneiro also discussed Common Market membership, relating all the government's activity in stimulating negotiations. "Since we regard this membership as our priority of priorities because of its historical and cultural as well as social and economic repercussions." Discussing his European visits as prime minister with the aim of accelerating this membership, he described them as "positive and useful" and said he hoped that "Portugal can enter the EEC early in 1983 under the best possible conditions."

He pointed out that relations have also been established with countries "with which it was unthinkable for Portugal not to have relations, such as Saudi Arabia, as well as strengthening our cooperation and trade with the new Portuguese-speaking countries in a spirit of mutual respect for the political and ideological independence of both Portugal and these nations."

"Defense policy, which is not merely military policy, is the government's duty," Sa Carneiro continued in the next part of his address. In this connection he pointed out that "during this transitional period that will end with the revision of the constitution, the armed forces are not answerable to the government, as in fully democratic regimes, inasmuch as their governments are responsible for their command. In our country parliament alone approves the armed forces budget." But, he went on, "defense policy regarded as the values of the defense of freedom and security as a whole, including the reform of the armed forces from a political as well as technico-military, viewpoint, rests with the government and has been duly carried out by the government." Thus, he said, "steps have been taken to launch a project, which has been well received by NATO and to which we are now committed, to reequip our navy with the construction of three frigates." Defense policy, he stressed, is necessary and essential in a democratic regime, and we are laying the foundations now so that when we have a fully democratic regime we will have the kind of national defense policy suitable for us not only as an independent and free country that values its external and internal security but also as a NATO member country willing and keen to meet its obligations and, proceeding within this framework, to take action to reform and equip our armed forces."

POLICE OFFICERS RESIGN IN PROTEST AT LISBON CHIEF'S DISMISSAL

LD222116 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Excerpt] The commander general of the Public Security Police [PSP] has tendered his resignation. Gen Lopes Alves himself confirmed this piece of news to Portuguese Radio this afternoon. This resignation came in the wake of the dismissal by the government of Lieutenant Colonel Aparicio from the post of PSP Lisbon district commander.

Gen Lopes Alves said yesterday that he would tender his resignation as PSP commander general on the day when the official gazette carried the government notice dismissing Lieutenant Colonel Aparicio. His dismissal was gazetted today.

In the meantime a Portuguese Radio team of reporters has been able to discover that a number of army officers seconded to the Public Security Police have also tendered their resignations. To date in the Lisbon District Command alone some 10 officers have submitted their resignation notices. These include Lt Col Mario Correia, who was to assume the Lisbon District Command, replacing the dismissed Lieutenant Colonel Aparicio, Deputy Commander Santiago Maia, and Cascais Divisional Commander Maj Martins Mendonca.

The resigning officers take the view that since the police have to serve the public and not the party in power, all police appointments and dismissals should be based only on the criterion of professional competence and not of political confidence. To make these police posts held by seconded army officers subject to party political considerations is intolerable and we cannot come to terms with it, a police source told the ANOP news agency this morning.

DEFENSE SECRETARY BROWN'S LETTERS ON DEFENSE PUBLISHED

[Christian Broendum report: "Government Makes Public U.S. Criticism"]

[Excerpt] "The letters from the U.S. Defense Secretary confirm that a 3 percent increase in the Danish defense budget is really quite a modest request. If Denmark was really going to live up to its commitments we should be thinking of an annual increase of 4 to 5 percent." Folketing Defense Committee Chairman Palle Simonsen (Conservative Party) made this statement after the government yesterday decided to make public U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown's two letters to Defense Minister Poul Soegaard and gave as the reason the fact that the considerable press coverage could given an incorrect impression of the contents of the correspondence. Palle Simonsen said that he can easily understand why the Americans would refuse to send over 1 million young Americans to Europe in a war situation if we ourselves cannot be bothered to make our own contribution to the alliance.

OFFICIALS' REACTION

[Jens Thomsen report: "Brown's Letters Have No Military Significance"]

[Excerpt] "I have been aware of the contents of U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown's letters for some time. They contain nothing more than general political pressure to produce as high a Danish defense potential as possible," Social Democratic spokesman and Folketing Member Preben Steer Nielsen said in a commentary on the correspondence between Harold Brown and Poul Soegaard that has now been made public.

Harold Brown's suggestion in his letter of 23 January this year that all NATO partners had agreed to an annual increase in defense spending of 3 percent is rejected by Preben Steen Nielsen. "This is not true. Denmark expressed reservations and this has been clear the whole time." Preben Steen Nielsen added that no military or strategic significance for Denmark is being attached to Harold Brown's letters, only political significance with regard to the U.S. Congress. "Brown's letters are simply political threats and do not mean any change in military strategy with regard to reinforcements. Negotiations on these are continuing, and I do not think they will be much influenced by whether the Danish defense budget totals 8.10 or 8.12 billion kroner."

Folketing Defense Committee Chairman Palle Simonsen (Conservative Party) rejects the suggestion that Harold Brown's letters are to be seen as attempts to pressure Denmark. "It is a crucial consideration for me that U.S. Defense Secretary Brown clearly states that it is of course a Danish national decision what kind of defense force we will have. "On the other hand the letters are a reminder of the political realities and the possible consequences if Denmark itself does not want to set aside sufficient sums for national defense. If Denmark and other Western European nations do not want to follow NATO's proposed target of a 3-percent increase in defense budgets, this could lead at the deepest level to a new U.S. isolationist policy. And this would be extremely serious for Europe," Palle Simonsen said.

Defense Chief Knud Joergensen did not wish to comment on the newly published letters, whose contents he regards as political, but the general added that Brown's statements about the disbanding of one brigade in Sjaelland, the scrapping of a squadron of combat aircraft, 12 warships and a staff reduction of over 4,000 men are correct.

PARTIES TO DISCUSS LAW ON SUMMONING ALLIED REINFORCEMENTS

LD221355 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 18 Sep 80 Part 1 p 8

[Christian Broendum report: "Soegaard: Reinforcements During a Crisis Too"]

[Excerpt] The Danish political parties that traditionally support the Danish defense settlements and the government will jointly decide whether the Danish Government should have the ability to call for reinforcements from abroad even before the outbreak of war.

Defense Minister Poul Soegaard made this announcement to BERLINGSKE TIDENDE. The present, defense law proposed in 1973, states that reinforcements can be called for in a war situation. This means that the government has no formal power to call for reinforcements in a crisis situation, that is, before the outbreak of war, Poul Soegaard said.

"There will have to be a change in phrasing, if the phrase "in a crisis situation" is to be included. It is this that will have to be discussed--both within the government and among the parties that support defense settlements."

Poul Soegaard does not want to say anything yet about the consequences if a change in the phrasing is not adopted. The reason for the proposed change is that since 1973 it has become necessary to be able to obtain reinforcements more quickly than before.

"We must admit that this is a situation that was not foreseen at that point in time (in 1973, that is, that it could happen that Denmark would have to call for reinforcements at an earlier stage than was envisaged."

Poul Soegaard added that this decision is connected with the question of depots for definite, earmarked U.S. relief troops in Denmark. No political decision has yet been made on the depots. "We must assume that it would be very difficult to get troops here in a situation in which war had already been declared. It is this which makes it necessary to discuss the matter in the government and with the parties that normally support defense settlements."

COMPANY TO MINE URANIUM AT ALTERNATIVE SITE

LD250947 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 23 Sep 80 p 1

[Unattributed report: "Profitable To Mine Uranium"]

[Text] The Luossavaara-Kiurunavaara Aktiebolag will probably start mining uranium, but not in Ranstad.

According to information given to SVENSKA DAGBLADET the company will make an application at the end of the year for permission to start commercial activities at Pleutajokk near Arjeplog. It should be possible to produce 480 tons of uranium per year there--one-third of Swedish needs--and this would provide employment for 150 men.

Luossavaara-Kirunavaara Aktiebolag has been prospecting in Pleutajokk since 1976. Test mining was carried out this summer and the results are very promising. It is estimated that one ton or rock will produce approximately one kilogram of uranium. The bottom limit for profitability has been estimated in this case as around 700 grams.

Direct comparisons with Billingen cannot be made. The uranium deposit in Ranstad is one of the world's largest. The project there which had to be abandoned was intended to produce 470 tons of uranium per year. But to produce this quantity, three times as much rock would have to be mined as in Pleutajokk, where the concentration of uranium is much greater.

FOREIGN OFFICE'S DOUGLAS HURD ON IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT

LD241853 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1843 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Text] London, 24 Sep (LPA)--Foreign Office Minister Mr Douglas Hurd made a strong plea today for stability in the Persian Gulf area, scene of the war between Iraq and Iran. He said: "The fact of the matter is that our interest in the Gulf, whether talking about Iraq or Iran, is simply in stability. Stability means cooperation." But because of Britain's links with the area there was a belief in Gulf and Middle Eastern countries "that Britain is closely, intimately involved, constantly pursuing subtle webs of intrigue."

He said Britain had been trying to encourage the Gulf states to work together in their own security. "Iraq had become more of a Gulf state than before," Mr Hurd added. Britain had no quarrel with the Iranian revolution. "We do not want to replace one particular set-up with another," he told the Diplomatic and Commonwealth Writers' Association lunch. Stability was a vital British interest in the region. It meant Britain could continue trading with some of her best customers, importing oil, and preventing the area from becoming a tinderbox.

Mr Hurd disclosed he had talks in London on Tuesday night with Saudi Arabia's foreign minister, Prince Al Sa'ud. The talks were useful, he said, but gave no details.

He added that a convoy of vehicles carrying about 100 Britons, mainly women and children, but including some men, had set out this morning from Baghdad for Amman, the Jordanian capital. The British Government was discouraging Britons from going to Iraq unless they had essential reasons, he said.

THAI MINISTER'S UPCOMING VISIT, UK CONTACTS WITH ASEAN VIEWED

BK241226 Hong Kong AFP in English 1214 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Excerpt] London, 24 Sep (AFP)--Thai Foreign Minister Air Chief Marshal Sitthi Sawetsila arrives here on Friday from Luxembourg for talks expected to focus on the controversy over the Cambodian seat in the United Nations and the situation on the Thai-Cambodian border. British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington will be in Hong Kong, after attending the UN General Assembly in New York, and Marshal Sitthi's talks will be with the Lord Privy Seal Sir Ian Gilmour and Minister of State at the Foreign Office Peter Blaker, a specialist in Southeast Asian affairs.

Marshal Sitthi, who paid a two-day official visit to London in early June, will reiterate Thailand's support for the ousted Khmer Rouge regime's campaign to keep their UN seat, claimed by the Vietnamese-backed Heng Samrin government. Britain is expected to fully support Bangkok on this issue, but sources close to the Foreign Office said today they were not sure it was on the agenda of the current assembly. The foreign minister will also discuss the possible deployment of a UN peacekeeping force along Thailand's border with Cambodia. London suggested last year that such a force should be set up "if events warranted it", and the general feeling here at the moment is that a peacekeeping force would currently be fully justified.

Before leaving on his current tour, which will take him to Beijing after Hong Kong and Tokyo, Lord Carrington told the New China News Agency (NCNA) that the British Government gave its full support to an Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) call for a political solution to the Cambodian problem. The Foreign secretary told NCNA that such a solution demanded the "full withdrawal of Vietnamese forces" from Cambodia. Meanwhile observers expected Marshal Sitthi, who had talks in June with British Defence Secretary Francis Pym, to request aid from Britain to boost Thai defence forces.

INTERLOCUTORS HOLD SECOND MEETING, MAKE STATEMENTS

NC241744 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Text] The second meeting in the new round of intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace hotel in Nicosia this afternoon. The subject of today's meeting was the adoption of practical measures by both sides for promoting goodwill, mutual confidence and the return of normal conditions on the basis of point 6 of the 19 May agreement.

Replying to questions before the meeting, Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, said that after last week's meeting he had had separate contacts with representatives of both communities with a view to better preparations for the joint meetings. Gobbi repeated that no quick results should be expected in the beginning, and added that the most significant result of the previous meeting was that a very serious dialogue had taken place. This, he stressed, is a very positive result. If we normalize the dialogue, if we maintain a civilized dialogue, Gobbi concluded, then we shall see the light at the end of the tunnel.

In addition, Gobbi also appealed to journalists to display restraint and a positive approach to news reporting, comments and the coverage of the inter-Cypriot talks in general.

In a statement on his arrival, Ioannidhis, the representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the talks, said that at today's meeting they would discuss practical measures for promoting goodwill, mutual confidence and the return of normal conditions, a subject that is of concern to both communities. We expect to hear the views of the other side, he said, and it in turn expects to hear ours on the subject. It is most important, continued Ioannidhis, for us to continue the dialogue in a friendly climate. The dialogue could develop into a constructive one, he added.

The message for today, Ioannidhis said, is goodwill, mutual confidence and the return to normal conditions. Ioannidhis finally expressed his conviction that journalists could play a significant role in this direction.

Replying to a question as to whether the Greek Cypriot side would also submit proposals at today's meeting, Ioannidhis said that this would become apparent during the course of the talks. We shall first hear the views of the Turkish Cypriot side, he added. Asked whether the Greek Cypriot side would agree to speed up the pace of the meetings, Ioannidhis replied that the Greek Cypriot side would definitely welcome anything that would lead to constructive talks.

In his statement Umit Suleyman Onan, the representative of the Turkish Cypriot side, said that he would submit proposals at today's meeting and that he expected that the Greek Cypriot side would also submit its proposals.

Asked whether he agreed to a speed up of the pace of the talks, Onan said that for the time being it was better if we went ahead slowly. As Gobbi has also said, he added, it is better if we make slow progress rather than move ahead hastily.

Replying to an observation that Soysal, the Turkish expert, was not with him today, Mr Onan said that he was absent because constitutional issues were not going to be discussed at today's meeting.

Asked to comment on the stand adopted by the Cypriot Government regarding the debate on the Cypriot question at the UN General Assembly, Onan said that it was a positive step. In essence, he added, it is a question of one of the steps that must be taken to prevent whatever could endanger the talks. We have resumed the talks, he continued, and it is our wish to see something come out of them. Although the talks are not expected to bring results in the initial stages, both sides must at least be given the opportunity to make an intensive effort to find a solution.

Closing Statement

[Text] The intercommunal talks, which are aimed at finding a peaceful solution to the Cyprus talks, continued in a meeting in the Ledra Palace today. A statement was issued at the end of the meeting, which lasted about 4 hours. The statement noted the second point of the agenda was discussed during the meeting: the practical measures to be taken by the two sides to promote good will and mutual confidence and the return to normal conditions as envisaged by the sixth point of the 19 May agreement.

The statement said that the meeting was held in a friendly atmosphere and a detailed and sincere exchange of views was held on the subject. In addition, the statement noted that possible areas of cooperation between the two communities which would benefit both communities and the abstention from actions which would adversely affect the outcome of the talks were among the issues discussed during the meeting.

According to the statement, both sides agreed to study the views expressed during the meeting with sincerity, good will and understanding. The next meeting will be held at 1630 North Cyprus Time and at 1530 South Cyprus Time on Wednesday, 1 October. The third point on the agenda, constitutional issues, will be discussed during this next meeting.

During today's meeting, the Turkish Cypriot community was represented by Turkish Cypriot negotiator Umit Suleyman Onan and his advisors Necati Munir Ertekun and Rustem Tatar. The Greek Cypriot community was represented by Greek Cypriot negotiator Ioannidhis and his advisors Mrs Soulioti and Mr Trianfafillidhis. KHARAVYI ATTACKS STATIONING OF U-2'S AT AKROTIRI

[From the "Views and Comments" column: "With the Struggle of the State and the People"]

[Text] There was no need for REUTER to confirm that the U.S. U-2 spy planes are using the British base at Akrotiri. To this effect, there is the unfortunate agreement between the Cypriot Government and the United States as well as other "interested" parties for surveilling the Israeli-Egyptian truce in Sinai. And while the reason for the surveillance ceased to exist following the As-Sadat-Begin reconciliation, thanks to Carter, what remains is the actual reason: to spy on the Soviet Union. Following the dissolution of the U.S.' spy machinery by the revolution in Iran, Cyprus in particular has become more useful to them. According to REUTER, the spy flights by the U.S. U-2's are "essential at least until 1983."

We have reminded the president many times that the agreement on U-2's at Akrotiri must be abolished. However, the president does not listen to such things, and he has never taken any action. Not only do we have the U-2 spy planes, but the U.S. and NATO military presence at the British "sovereign" bases is continuously becoming more manifold. If one of our officials questions the Americans or the British about this issue, they "state on oath" that there is no U.S. or NATO presence at the bases! The president and his government politely accept these assurances, yet it is impossible for him or his government not to be aware of the large-scale U.S. activities that have been observed in Cyprus and that are carried out by its spy planes, radio stations, and military units. Thus, in light of the partnership at the bases, we can assume that our island has been converted into a huge storehouse for nuclear weapons, weapons that if put to use will sink the Cypriot people along with their "unsinkable aircraft carrier."

Being conscious of the terrible dangers, it is the duty of the state and the people to struggle for the removal of foreign bases and troops from Cyprus. To the end, we will have unlimited international support, this also being part of the solidarity for a fair political solution for Cyprus.

EDEK REPEATS CALL FOR COLLABORATION PROGRAM

[Text] The socialist EDEK Party of Dr Lissaridhis yesterday repeated its call for a minimum agreed programme of collaboration among the parties.

It again accused the three other parties, AKEL, the [Democratic] Rally party of Mr Kliridhis and the Democratic Party of Mr Kiprianou of accepting a "dangerous" procedure for the talks in getting one subject each week by rotation.

The stress being laid on Famagusta tends to create a "Famagustanisation" of the Cyprus problem, the EDEK party says.

The EDEK party defends its policy on the national and other issues, and said it is the party which holds out the promise of change.

AKEL STATEMENT URGES VIGILANCE AGAINST EOKA-B REEMERGENCE

NC210928 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 21 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[20 September AKEL Central Committee Political Bureau statement on reemergence of EOKA-B]

[Text] Last Thursday's statement by known EOKA-B personalities, among whom were also unrepentant coupists, constitutes a very bold provocation against and abuse of the entire patriotic Cypriot people. The unrepentant EOKA-B coupists, who are guilty of the July 1974 junta-fascist coup, persons who are guilty of high treason against their fatherland, instead of hiding their faces with shame for the calamities they brought to the people, not only have not repented of their crime but have had the audacity to become overly defensive of their traitorous task. These persons, instead of being imprisoned for their crimes, are not only free but are reorganizing themselves and are provoking, warning and threatening the Cypriot people and primarily the patriotic forces.

At a moment when Cyprus is going through a very critical time and immediately following the resumption of the new round of intercommunal talks, the unrepentant coupists are once again flying the banner of enosis profiteering, knowing full well that with this they are undermining the talks and exposing Cyprus to the danger of being completely taken over by Turkey. Today, by flying the enosis banner, the PEA [Progressive Fighters Union] and the EAL [Union of Nicosia Fighters], whether they want to or not, are objectively acting as organs and promoters of the NATOist plan for double enosis, partition, Cyprus' NATOism and the dissolution of the Cyprus state, a UN member.

This statement is characteristic of the situation prevailing on our domestic front. First of all, this statement is our party Central Committee's confirmaton that EOKA-B is being reorganized, reactivated and is preparing for new acts of violence and crimes and thus preparing to strike new blows against the Cypriot people.

Simultaneously, this action by unrepentant EOKA-B coupists stresses very strongly the tremendous responsibilities that President Kiprianou and the government have in this situation.

This is because it is evident that the government's inactivity and the president's failure to take drastic measures--as have been persistently demanded and are being demanding by AKEL, the house and other patriotic forces--to stamp out lawlessness, to collect all unlawful arms from EOKA-B groups and any other groups and to cause their dissolution, and to carry out a true purge has provided fertile soil which has nourished the boldness of the unrepentant EOKA-B coupists and has allowed them to throw warnings and threats at the patriotic forces of the Cypriot people.

Basic responsibility for this unacceptable situation must also be borne by the DISI [Democratic Rally] party and its leader, Jliridhis. Since its establishment the DISI, despite the fact that it sheltered and continues to shelter the EOKA-B coupists politically, with its leadership's anticommunist policy constitutes the natural pedestal for the appearance and reactivation of the organizations of the unrepentant coupist personalities. These threats constitute a natural extension and continuation of the provocative anticommunist slogans "hang the communists" and other similar slogans, which fanatic anticommunists shouted under the smile and approval of DISI leader Kliridhis at the Pan-Cypriot Youth gathering as well as other similar slogans that dominated the DISI rally last June.

The AKEL Central Committee Political Bureau unreservedly condemns the revival of the junta-fascist and the enosis profiterring, which is expressed with this statement and which it pursues to cultivate tension, hatred, bigotry and anticommunism in order to disorientate the people from the correct course in solving the Cypriot issue through the intercommunal talks and based on the four guidelines of the Makarios-Denktas agreement, the 10 points in the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement, and the relevant UN resolutions.

AKEL calls on President Kiprianou to become aware of the dangers that the revival of fascism constitute and to take, even now, the most drastic measures to stamp out lawlessness and the collection of unlawful arms by EOKA-B and any other groupings, to effect the arrest and the exemplary punishment, first of all, of the unrepentant coupists and to carry out a genuine and substantive purge of the state machinery and security forces.

AKEL urges all patriotic forces and people irrespective of ideological and other differences, to an intensive vigilance to foil any threats and plans of imperialism, the CIA and their agents and, in general, the forces of abnormality [dhinameon tis anomalias] in creating a climate of agitation and clashes.

Finally, AKEL urges the people and, first of all, the patriotic forces to maintain unity, vigilance and their joint and determined struggle for securing normality and the peaceful course for the solution of the Cypriot issue by foiling any provocations and anti-Cypriot plans by the enemies of Cyprus.

Government Response

NC221117 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Text] An official statement, referring to AKEL's fears and concern about a probable revival of violence by coupist elements, stresses that the security forces closely watch any action or activity that might either help the revival of a coupist or terrorist state of affairs or disturb public order and security. The statement says: The president of the republic and the government are determined--as in the past--to immediately take measures and combat at the outset any attempt at creating a state of anomaly and agitation.

The statement adds: It is again assured that the aim of the president and the government is to resolve the Cyprus problem through the intercommunal talks, based on the four guidelines included in the Makarios-Denktas agreement and the 10 points of the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement. Neither the president nor the government will deviate from this aim nor will they allow that any irresponsible quarters undermine this effort. The statement concludes: Any such attempt will be met with the necessary resoluteness.

FURTHER REPORTAGE ON THATCHER VISIT, MEETINGS

Dinner Speech

AT231326 Athens NEWS in English 23 Sep 80 pp 3, 6

[Excerpts] British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher arrived in Athens Monday for a three-day official visit, the first by a British head of government since 1958. In the evening, Prime Minister Rallis hosted a dinner in honor of Mrs. Thatcher. Responding to the prime minister, Mrs. Thatcher said, among others things:

We have much in common. We are both of us outward looking nations and trading nations.

Referring to Greece's re-entry into military NATO, she said: It is all the more disturbing to friends of Greece that problems remain unsolved which weaken the cohesion of the alliance at its southern flank. It is of the highest importance that Greece returns soon to the military structure of NATO. We all want you back in--urgently. A solution is essential, both for Greece's sake and for that of the rest of us in the alliance.

Before I turn to other matters, it is right that I should mention Cyprus--an issue that has both united and divided us in the past. We, like you, have a keen and direct interest in the stability of the Eastern Mediterranean. I know that you will welcome, as I do, the resumption of the intercommunal talks in Nicosia. It is only if both communities can find a way of living together that harmony can be restored to that unhappy island.

Like you also, we have for long been acutely concerned by the economic and political problems of our common ally, Turkey. It is my hope that the recent dramatic changes will enable order and stability to be restored and the promise of a full return to democracy to be honored. Those sincerely trying to achieve this have our understanding. A stable, prosperous and democratic Turkey is in the interests of us all.

Meeting with Papandreou

[Excerpts] During the second day of her official visit to Athens British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was received at 1245 by President of the Republic Karamanlis at the presidential mansion. As has been learned, during the 45-minute meeting, which was held in a very cordial atmosphere, the international situation was examined and, within this framework, the course of Europe. The Middle East problem and differences between Greece and Turkey were also examined.

After the conclusion of talks at 1200, Mrs Margaret Thatcher received at the Maximos Mansion the leader of the official opposition, PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou, and had a talk with him on issues which concern the two countries. After the meeting the PASOK chairman made the following press statement: I naturally welcomed Mrs Thatcher to our country and told her that it would be good to see the rest of Greece besides Athens. Mrs Thatcher has the right to divulge the content of our talks.

On my part, I explained to her PASOK's views on the recent events in Turkey and the repercussions these may have on Greek-Turkish relations. I also expounded to her the PASOK positions toward NATO stating that in Greece we view NATO differently because we have had experienced the recent dictatorship and the Turkish invasion in Cyprus. I also expressed my viewpoint on the events in Poland and their probable repercussions. The discussion about our positions was frank on both sides. In addition, the old friendship which links our two countries still exists and I hope that the friendly relations between the two countries will develop even further.

Papandreou concluded by describing the personality of Mrs Thatcher which he considers very strong and frank. Papandreou has accepted an invitation by the British Government to visit Britain in late November.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON MUSKIE-GROMYKO MEETING

LD261110 Hamburg DPA in German 0905 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn (DPA) Federal Foreign Minister Genscher has the impression that the United States and the USSR are aware of their responsibility for the preservation of world peace. In an interview with Deutschlandfunk, Genscher said today that it was decisive in a difficult crisis for the two great powers to act in immediate contact [phrase as received] with one another. "That is something we have always wanted--on other occasions, too," the foreign minister said.

After his talks in New York with U.S. Secretary of State Muskie and his Soviet opposite number Gromyko, Genscher assumes that there will be no outside interference in the Iranian-Iraqi conflict. This is an elementary demand for the preservation of world peace. Perhaps the way to attempt had been made in New York, thanks to the presence of many foreign ministers, to confine the conflict from the very first moment to the two countries concerned could become a model for future events if this kind which, it is to be hoped, would not occur too often.

Genscher also welcomed the agreement between Muskie and Gromyko for the U.S.-Soviet negotiations on the limitation of nuclear medium-range missiles to start on 13 October. In a statement released by the Foreign Ministry, Genscher says that this is an important step toward putting the arms control element of NATO's dual decision of 12 December last year into concrete shape. It is now becoming clear that the visit paid by the chancellor and himself to Moscow this summer had made an essential contribution to the coming about of the U.S.-Soviet dialogue.

FURTHER REASONS GIVEN FOR POSTPONING SCHMIDT'S GDR VISIT

LD251322 Hamburg DPA in German 1111 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 25 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's visit to Rostock this summer was canceled by the GDR because of the Warsaw Pact maneuvers. Gunter Huonker, minister of state in the federal chancellor's office, made this statement to CDU Deputy Alois Mertes in reply to a question on this matter.

During his visit to Werbellinsee outside Berlin for talks with GDR state and party leader Erich Honecker in August, Schmidt also wanted to pay brief visits to Rostock and Guestrow in Mecklenburg. The cancellation of the Rostock visit was one of the reasons why Bonn called off the meeting with Honecker.

In an official statement by the Federal Government, Klaus Boelling said on 22 August: "It is the Federal Government's view that developments which have taken place in Europe in recent days do not make next week an appropriate time."

While one of the reasons given by Bonn at that time for calling off the visit was that the East Berlin Foreign Ministry said during preparations for the visit that it knew nothing about a joint Schmidt-Honecker dinner, Huonker now says he proceeded from the premise that there naturally would have been a joint dinner. In his reply to the CDU deputy, Huonker confirms that the federal chancellor's opinion is that a meeting with the GDR State Council chairman should take place at a "later, more appropriate time."

STRIKE BY WEST BERLIN REICHSBAHN EMPLOYEES ENDING

LD251436 Hamburg DPA in German 1403 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Summary] Berlin, 25 Sep (DPA)--It seems clear that the strike by West Berlin employees of the GDR Reichsbahn, which for a week has paralyzed all freight, and most of the passenger traffic, is coming to an end.

A spokesman for the strike committee said today that the strike is ending because "we have been driven to it." A decision to this effect is expected at a mass meeting of strikers tonight.

Most of the strikers in the meantime have joined the West German Railway Union (CDED) following their promise to help them to find new jobs. It is not clear how many railwaymen were fired by the Reichsbahn for taking part in the strike and how many gave notice. It seems that the figure could run to several hundred.

Freight traffic between West Berlin and federal territory is returning to normal. Mixed freight trains are running as before the strike, but there are not yet a service container and coal trains. One of the reasons seems to be a shortage of engineers in the GDR.

The S-Bahn is running intermittently on certain sectors of the network only, and it seems that the main concern of the Reichsbahn will be to return freight traffic to normal. The question is now whether in face of the firings and resignations by West Berlin Reichsbahn employees the management of the Reichsbahn will be able to resume full service on the S-Bahn.

BRANDT ON DETENTE PROCESS, FRG ROLE IN EUROPE

LD251101 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 22 Sep 80 p 4

[B. Knapen interview with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt in a train between Bremen and Bonn during his election campaign: "Bonn's Political Influence Greater but Leadership Role Impossible"; date of interview not given]

[Excerpt] Bremen/Bonn, 22 September--[Question] The opposition says that detente policy has failed. It cites the unrest in Poland as an example. Do developments like those in Poland have consequences for detente policy?

[Answer] No, definitely not. Events in Poland have absolutely nothing to do with the detente policy. I have never considered that internal relationships in another country can be changed by detente policy. That is an illusion.

Detente policy really means that, irrespective of the political systems in East and West, the threat of war can be reduced, relations can be normalized, trade can be increased, and human understanding brought about. In reality the relationship is the following: Only by having normal relations between states and only because there is now no longer any trace of German revanchist feeling can the desire for reform in these (East European--NRC HANDELSBLAD editor's note) countries be developed; however, I do not know how far this development will go.

Change

[Question] However, looking at it in that light, detente policy has instigated a move toward reform in Poland. Won't that make communist leaders more reluctant to have relations with the West?

[Answer] Instigate is too strong a word. I would not use it because it could lead some people into an undesirable line of thought....

However, people must seriously consider the fact that the situation in Europe will not remain in the long term as it is now. I am surprised to find how little some Soviet leaders know about Marxist theories, not to mention the Hegelian bases of those theories. Those leaders think that things can always stay the same.

However, that has never been the case in the world's history: Eastern and Western Europe will change.

[Question] To be more specific: The Polish leadership must fear that detente is not a means to help it remain master in its own house?

[Answer] That is not the conclusion which the Polish leadership draws. I am pleased about that, so why should I draw such a conclusion in the Polish leadership's place? On the contrary, the Soviet Union is reopening contacts with the United States on arms limitation. Muskie and Gromyko are having talks this week to prepare for the October talks. The Polish leaders are preparing to take part in the CSCE followup conference which begins in Madrid on 11 November.

Arms Negotiations

[Question] In view of the present difficulties what chance is there for East-West arms negotiations in 1981?

[Answer] That depends a great deal on the result of the U.S. elections. Whatever happens arms negotiations will certainly not be simple; however, if Carter's presidency is continued the functioning of the government machinery will be easier than in a new administration which would have to find its way on this subject. I am not giving preference to any candidates but am simply speaking on the basis of previous U.S. presidential elections. A president who is reelected has his machinery in place and, moreover, after 4 years can never be president again. Therefore he is also not so inclined by tactical considerations toward particular groups.

[Question] Some people think that the Soviet Union is not very anxious to open negotiations while the West is so divided, for instance about the deployment of medium-range weapons on its territory.

[Answer] I would be very sorry if Moscow thought like that. The Soviets must consider the fact that the Germans, independent of any other country, are abiding by the decision which NATO took in December last year (in which it was decided to deploy medium-range weapons in Europe linked with negotiations with the Soviet Union--B. Knapen note).

FRG's Role

[Question] Shouldn't the FRG play a greater political role in the Western alliance?

[Answer] No. The Western alliance would not tolerate that. However, the Western alliance must adapt to more European responsibility in addition to U.S. responsibility. This does not mean that one West European state should dominate the others. Therefore we must constantly seek means to create a united West European responsibility aside from French-German relations, even aiming at Europe forming a kind of second pillar in NATO. For many reasons--not only our geopolitical position--we are opposed to more West German responsibility than is reasonable. Despite its economic strength, the FRG is still a medium power and does not want to become a nuclear state. These factors mean that we cannot allow ourselves to be forced into a leadership role. Having said that, however, it is still true, of course, that our political influence has increased, not least because of the Ostpolitik. Before that the Western powers spoke on our behalf. Since we introduced the Ostpolitik we have spoken for ourselves.

VIABILITY OF U.S. 'LIMITED NUCLEAR WAR' STRATEGY EXAMINED

DW251305 Bonn RHEINISHCHER MERKUR in German 26 Sep 80 p 8

[Armand Clesse article: "Soviet Missiles--Difficult for America To Verify"]

[Text] The new U.S. military strategy which is contained in the Presidential Directive PD-59 envisages limited nuclear strikes against military installations as well as command and control structures in the Soviet Union.

Above all the ICBM silos (meaning the silos for the intercontinental ballistic missiles) are to be destroyed in response to a Soviet attack, without the civilian population being affected. In this way an escalation into unlimited nuclear war and thus mutual destruction is to be prevented.

However, the question poses itself as to whether the geographical location of the Soviet ICBM silos would allow the Americans to carry out such a strategy at all. The Soviet "Strategic missile forces" include 1,398 ICBM's stored in 27 silos which are scattered all over the country. The large SS-18 missiles, for instance, are based in six missile fields in southern central Asia. The SS-11 missiles, which were deployed over a relatively wide area, are now being replaced with SS-17 and SS-10 missiles up to a ceiling of 512 missiles as stipulated by the SALT agreement.

Two-thirds of the Soviet missile complexes are located deep in the interior of the country. This would confront the U.S. offensive systems with great difficulties:

The extremely efficient Soviet air defense would make it difficult and even impossible for the U.S. bombers to advance to their targets or to launch short-range missiles or cruise missiles to these targets;

The Galosh interceptor missiles around Moscow offer a certain although not full protection for the roughly 300 ICBM's deployed in a relatively close periphery of the Soviet capital;

The U.S. submarine-based Poseidon missiles have a range of only 2,500 sea miles, so that the SS-18 fields are out of their range of action.

In addition, about half of the Soviet ICBM fields are west of the Urals, some of them near the most densely populated areas of the Soviet Union. Consequently, any American retaliatory strike against Soviet missile silos would also be directed against densely populated and industrialized areas.

The Soviets might find it extremely difficult to assess the U.S. retaliatory strikes correctly, which means that possibly they might be unable to find out whether the 1,000 or 2,000 U.S. warheads are launched at missile silos or cities.

The objectively differing situations of the two superpowers--a Soviet attack against U.S. intercontinental ballistic missiles would do much less harm to the U.S. population than an equally heavy U.S. attack against Soviet ICBM's would do--makes it difficult, if not even impossible, for the responsible Soviet people to accept the term, now advanced by the Americans, of a "limited nuclear war."

GISCARD, IRAQ'S TARIQ 'AZIZ CONFER ON GULF SITUATION

NC251248 Paris AFP in English 1244 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 25 Sep (AFP)--Iraqi Deputy Premier Tariq 'Aziz assured France today that Iraq does not intend to hinder freedom of navigation in the Gulf or the Hormuz Strait, a French spokesman said.

The subject of weapons was not taken up, he said in answer to a question. (Paris newspapers speculated that Mr. Tariq would request arms.)

In a nearly 90-minute talk here with French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, Mr. 'Aziz said that Iraq has no territorial designs apart from the disputed areas, French presidential spokesman Jacques Blot said. Nor did Iraq intend to keep troops in Iran.

The president and deputy premier examined various formulas liable to enable the two beligerents to open negotiations. Mr. Giscard d'Estaing stressed the "desirability of having Iraqi authorities express as soon as possible their willingness to open negotiations," the spokesman said.

The president also hoped that Islamic countries should have a "particular role" in seeking a solution. He said France considered freedom of navigation in the Gulf and strait of "vital importance", Mr. Blot said.

Mr. 'Aziz replied that Iraq "would undertake nothing that might endanger that liberty", the spokesman said.

Mr. 'Aziz was in Moscow when the hostilities with Iran broke out. He came to France after stopping in Jordan with King Husayn, who had come out in support of Iraq.

France has become Iraq's second most important source of military equipment after the Soviet Union since 1977. Sixty French Mirage F-1 interceptors are to be delivered under a contract signed several years ago.

Fifty French Gazelle helicopters are already operational in Iraq, which also has 54 other French helicopters including 11 Super Frelons with guided air-to-sea missiles.

Iraq also has 100 French Panhard armoured rocket-launching vehicles and 300 French-built troop transport vehicles.

Iraq supplies about a quarter of France's crude oil--second only to Saudi Arabia. France is also supplying equipment for an Iraqi nuclear reactor to be called Osiraq. Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet yesterday said this nuclear cooperation was "purely for peaceful uses."

PARIS-MATCH POLL ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

WA251000 Paris LE MONDE in French 19 Sep 80 p 8

[Report: "Rocard on the Rise, Mitterrand Declining]

[Text] The weekly PARIS-MATCH published its ninth "barometer" of the presidential election on Thursday, 18 September. This poll was conducted on 11 and 12 September by Public S.A. among a national sample of 1,000 people representing the French population aged 18 and over.

According to the voting intentions expressed in the poll, if the election had been held on 11 and 12 September, Giscard would have won 58 percent of the votes on the second round against Mitterrand's 42 percent.

The gap is widening as compared to the previous poll conducted in July, which gave 53 percent of the vote to Giscard and 47 percent to Mitterrand. On the other hand, if Rocard were a candidate, Giscard and his Socialist rival would be equal in the second round (50-50), whereas in July Rocard was four points behind Giscard (52-48).

In the first round, Giscard would receive 36 percent of the votes (a gain of four points since July) against 22 percent (no change) for Mitterrand; 13 percent (a loss of two points) for Marchais; 9 percent and 6 percent (no change) respectively for Chirac and Debre; 2 percent (a loss of one) for Crepeau; 9 percent (no change) for the ecologists' candidate; 2 percent for Le Pen and 3 percent (a loss of one) for the extreme left.

If Rocard were the Socialist candidate, Giscard would obtain 33 percent of the vote (a gain of two) in comparison with 26 percent (a gain of four) for his Socialist adversary, and 14 percent (a loss of one) for Marchais. Chirac and Debre would remain at the same percentages, 9 and 6 respectively, while the ecologists' candidate would lose 3 points (7 percent instead of 10 percent in July).

As the RPR's only candidate, Chirac would receive 13 percent of the votes in the first round. If he were in this position, Debre would get 11 percent (no change).

Among Socialist sympathizers, 48 percent wish Rocard would be the candidate whereas 43 percent prefer Mitterrand. In that voter category, Rocard gained 8 points while Mitterrand lost 5 in comparison with July's figures.

Among RPR sympathizers, 44 percent wish Chirac would be the candidate (a loss of 16 points), 27 percent would like to see Debre the candidate (a gain of eight points), and 16 percent favor the candidacy of Chaban-Delmas (a gain of five points).

FRANCE TO SELL PATROL BOATS TO QATAR

NC251224 Paris AFP in English 1215 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 25 Sep (AFP)--France is to sell the Emirate of Qatar three fast patrol launches armed with 40mm Exocet sea-to-sea missiles, the French Defence Ministry said today.

A senior official said the deal, under an agreement signed following the visit this spring by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and Defence Minister Yvon Bourges, also included the sale of two coastal defence units equipped with the same missiles.

The Exocet missile has a 35-nautical-mile range and is claimed to be one of the most accurate guided weapons currently in operation.

France has also undertaken to train the Qatari crews of the new vessels.

PCP CENTRAL COMMITTEE COMMUNIQUE ON UPCOMING ELECTIONS

LD191609 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 11 Sep 80 p 3

[Apparent text of 9 September PCP Central Committee communique: "Vote for APU for Defeat for 'Democratic Alliance' and for Democratic Majority"]

[Text] A PCP Central Committee plenum took place 9 September. The Central Committee examined the political situation and the problems concerning the coming elections to the assembly of the republic, which will be held 5 October.

The Central Committee concluded that the essential proconditions have been created for the "Democratic Alliance" being defeated in the legislative elections, the Sa Carneiro/ Freitas do Amaral government being dismissed, the United People Alliance [APU] emerging strengthened and a democratic majority in the assembly of the republic--thpe basis for the formation of a democratic government--being formed.

The Central Committee expresses its confidence that the Portuguese people, following the election, will know how to defend and consolidate freedoms, the other gains of April [1974], national independence and the democratic system enshrined in the constitution.

1. "Democratic Alliance" Government's Subversive Plan

The PCP Central Committee took stock of the antipeople, antidemocratic and antinational policy and the unconstitutional, unlawful and subversive activity of the Sa Carneiro/ Freitas do Amaral "Democratic Alliance" government.

The Central Committee confirms that the "Democratic Alliance" government, whose principal aim is the elimination of the democratic gains of April and the restoration of the economic and political power of the monopolies (associated with imperialism) and of the big estate owners, has inflicted grave and severe damage on the Portuguese people, the country and the democratic system. It has worsened the living conditions of the workers and of the broadest people's masses. It has stolen from the agrarian reform hundreds of thousands of hectares of land, thousands of heads of livestock and machinery, installations, improvements, grainfields and unpicked fruit. It has worsened the position of the nationalized enterprises. It has handed over enterprises to saboteur employers. It has violated freedoms, citizens' rights and the laws and disregarded decisions of the courts. It has reintroduced reactionary policies in education. It has persecuted culture. It has appropriated the news media and the levers of economic power and the state apparatus. It has servilely subordinated Portuguese foreign policy to the interests of the most aggressive circles of U.S. imperialism. The damage and suffering caused by the "Democratic Alliance" government are incalculable and in some instances irreparable.

The Central Committee confirms that, nevertheless, as a result of the people's masses heroic struggle and the vitality of the institutions' functioning, the reactionary parties have not succeeded in carrying out their subversive plan, which was aimed at eliminating the democratic gains before the elections, transforming the elections into a farce (new electoral laws), fraudulently securing a majority of deputies in the assembly, succeeding in imposing unconstitutional and undemocratic referendums and thus creating the preconditions for the unconstitutional revision of the constitution, the elimination of the democratic system and the setting up of a new dictatorship.

Although still controlling the government, as it enters the election period the "Democratic Alliance" is losing ground, displaying the erosion caused by grave failures and internal difficulties and increasingly shaken by a growing defeatist state of mind.

2. Forcing Sa Carneiro Government's Dismissal

The Central Committee recalls that the PCP, and with it millions of Portuguese people, has struggled and is still struggling resolutely for the Sa Carneiro government's dismissal before the elections. The Central Committee emphasizes that if the government's dismissal has not occurred before the elections, it is essential that it occur as a result of the elections. By voting against the "Democratic Alliance" and reducing the "Democratic Alliance" to a minority in the assembly of the republic again, the Portuguese people will force the Sa Carneiro/Fritas do Amaral government's dismissal.

3. "Democratic Alliance" Is Heading Toward Defeat

The Central Committee concluded that the essential objective and subjective preconditions have been created for defeating the "Democratic Alliance" in the 5 October elections, reducing it again to a minority in the assembly of the republic.

Despite the influences and pressures on the electorate which the "Democratic Alliance" is exerting--monopolizing the news media, transforming government activity into an instrument of electioneering propaganda and using the state apparatus, public funds and the most shameless demagoguery toward this end--the "Democratic Alliance" is losing ground and seeing its basis of social support dwindle, and everything indicates that its electorate is also dwindling correspondingly. The volution of the political and social situation indicates that the "Democratic Alliance" is heading inexorably toward defeat.

4. Watchfulness for Conspiracy

The Central Committee emphasizes that the increasingly clear prospect of defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" in the legislative elections, while being a positive development of the utmost importance in national political life, is leading the reactionary forces to intensify their threats, provocative actions and antidemocratic conspiracy.

On the one hand, the "Democratic Alliance" and its government are increasing discriminatory, repressive and demagogic actions, illegalities, frauds and coercive actions which will call into question the democratic nature of the elections. On the other hand, many facts indicate that a plan is being formulated to prevent by unconstitutional, subversive and possibly violent means defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" and democratic victory in the coming elections resulting in the rapid dismissal of the Sa Carneiro/Freitas do Amaral government and the formation of a democratic government.

The Central Committee calls on party members, workers and democrats to exercise great watchfulness with respect to maneuvers, illegalities and frauds in the election process and all provocative, subversive and conspiratorial actions. The Central Committee expresses its confidence that the institutions are capable of defending the democratic system from any putschist attempts aimed at opposing the expression of Portuguese people's democratic will in the elections.

5. Consequences of Defeat for "Democratic Alliance"

The Central Committee concluded that the fact of the "Democratic Alliance" being reduced again to a minority in the assembly of the republic will in itself have far-reaching consequences in national political life. Defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" in the elections must necessarily, obligatorily and rapidly mean:

a) The dismissal of the Sa Carneiro/Freitas do Amaral government; b) the removal of the Popular Democratic Party [PPD] [former name of Social Democratic Party] and the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] from the area of government; c) the ending of the offensive against the democratic gains achieved through the revolution and the consolidation of those gains; d) the correction of the illegalities and outrages perpetrated by the "Democratic Alliance" government; and e) the creation of political preconditions for the formation of a real democratic majority in the Assembly of the Republic and of a democratic government with a democratic policy.

The PCP will struggle resolutely to ensure that these consequences of defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" in the elections are fully guaranteed.

6. Defeat for "Democratic Alliance"--People's Vote for Democracy

Defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" (the reduction of the "Democratic Alliance" deputies to a minority in the Assembly of the Republic) will reflect the people's vote for 25 April and democracy. For the electorate, over and above preference for this or that party or coalition, the great choice is either for the democratic forces (specifically the APU and the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS] or for the reactionary forces (specifically the "Democratic Alliance").

By voting for the APU and the FRS and by voting for the PCP and the Socialist Party [PS], the voters will unambiguously express both their demand for the fall of the Sa Carneiro government and the removal from power of the "Democratic Alliance" and the parties comprising it, and their demand for a democratic alternative based on the democratic parties--specifically the PCP and the PS.

Any attempt to distort the significance of the defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" in the elections and the majority vote for the APU and the FRS and to seek to create after the elections "another majority," incorrectly termed "center left," in which the PS and PPD would take part, would amount to disregarding and betraying the electorate's vote. There can be no democratic majority with democracy's enemies, with those who plan to destroy it.

After the defeat for the "Democratic Alliance," it will only be possible to form a democratic majority in the Assembly of the Republic with democrats--specifically communists and socialists.

7. For a Real Democratic Majority

The Central Committee concluded that accomplishing defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" in the elections implies that the numerical democratic majority resulting from the elections should be transformed through agreement among the democratic forces into a real democratic majority which will give parliamentary support to the formation of a democratic government. Contrary to what the PS leaders assert in their electioneering propaganda, no democratic party or democratic coalition will be in a position on its own to hold a majority of deputies and constitute an alternative.

The FRS, even if it succeeds in recovering part of the electorate which the PS has lost to the right, will remain very far from an absolute majority.

In the present state of the national political forces, a democratic majority is only possible by including communists and socialists.

Prompted by a conern to defeat reaction and make possible a democratic alternative, the Central Committee confirms the PCP's readiness to examine, before or after the elections, together with the PS and with other democratic parties, organizations and sectors all the problems concerning the formation of a real democratic majority in the Assembly of the Republic and the formation of a democratic government.

8. Vote for PS and FRS is Not "Useful Vote"

The Central Committee closely examined the statements made by PS leaders about the formation of the future majority and of the future government. The assertions that a "useful vote" is for the FRS (the PS), because the FRS (the PS) would achieve an absolute majority and therefore constitute an alternative on its own are mere electioneering propaganda. Both assertions are completely false and serve, among other aims, to conceal their real plans for agreements with the right.

Even if the PS recovers many of the votes which it has lost to the right, it will remain very far from a majority. The PS can only be an alternative in alliance with other political forces.

The Central Committee draws the voters' attention to PS Secretary General Mario Soares' repeated assertion according to which he does not want an agreement with the PCP and with the APU, which he describes as "totalitarian," but is prepared for an agreement with the PPD, which he describes as a "great democratic party," and with Sa Carneiro, whom he also praises as a "democrat."

These assertions seem to indicate that the PS would be prepared, after the defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" in the elections, to disregard the democratic significance of the electorate's voting and to conclude new agreements with the PPD for the formation of a new government. Under these conditions, a vote for the PS and a vote for the FRS could be a vote for the formation of a new coalition with the right. A vote for the PS and a vote for the FRS is not a sure and certain "useful vote" for democracy.

9. Wasted Votes for Leftists

The Central Committee considered the significance and consequences of the submitting of lists of candidates by leftist groups--specifically the Popular Democratic Union and the FUP [expansion unknown]. It is clear that these candidates are taking part in the election process objectively in order to hamper the progress and the election of deputies of the PCP and the APU and to facilitate the election of rightwing candidates.

The Central Committee recalls that in previous elections over 100,000 votes for the leftist groups were completely wasted and facilitated the election of rightwing candidates. The Central Committee emphasizes that, without real prospects of being elected, the leftist candidates are taking part as factors favorable to the election of "Democratic Alliance" deputies.

10. Vote for APU a Necessary, Sure and Certain Vote

The Central Committee concluded that the only sure and certain vote for democracy and the necessary and essential vote is a vote for the PCP and a vote for the APU. The PCP's and the APU's elected deputies will always firmly support the working people, freedoms, the gains of the revolution and the democratic system enshrined in the constitution.

The PCP's and the APU's elected deputies will advocate in the assembly of the republic unity among all democrats--specifically Communists and Socialists--and will always continue to struggle for a real democratic political majority and for a real democratic alternative.

Whereas the PS and FRS deputies could ally themselves with the reactionary parties, the PCP deputies will never ally themselves with reaction, will always be prepared for unity with other democrats and through their actions they will always stand by the significance of the people's vote for democracy.

The stronger the APU's representation in the assembly of the republic, the more possible it will be to prevent a new alliance between the PS and the right and to finally lead to PS to an agreement with the PCP with a view to the formation of a democratic government.

With respect to the elections in the autonomous regions of the Azores and Madeira to their respective regional assemblies, which will also be held 5 October, the foreseeable election of APU candidates and the participation of a consistent democratic voice in those regional assemblies will constitute a very important step toward the democratization and development of those regions.

11. Formation of Democratic Government

The Central Committee emphasized that the democratic victory reflected in the "Democratic Alliance's" reduction to a minority and in the corresponding majority of democrats in the assembly of the republic should result in the formation of a democratic government based on that majority.

The Central Committee warns against any attempts through an agreement or undertaking between the PS and the PPD or the CDS to form in the assembly of the republic a majority which, betraying the significance of the voting for the democratic forces against "Democratic Alliance," would seek to keep the reactionary parties in power at a time when they have just sustained a defeat in the elections.

The Central Committee emphasized that, just as there can be no democratic majority in the assembly of the republic without the PCP, there can be no truly democratic government, either, without the Communists' participation.

The PCP's participation in the government, being essential for defending freedoms, the peoples's interests and the democratic system and for resolving the nation's problems, is being demanded by increasingly broad sectors of the Portuguese people.

The Central Committee confirmed that the PCP is prepared, before and after the elections, to examine together with all the other democratic forces, specifically the PS, all the problems concerning the formation of a democratic government on the basis of the majority of deputies of the democratic forces elected 5 October.

12. Presidential Elections

The Central Committee examined the problems concerning the presidential elections. The Central Committee confirms the viewpoint previously put forward by the PCP: The results of the elections to the assembly of the republic will exert a profound influence on the presidential elections.

The profiles, personalities and prospects of success of the various candidates and the aims and style of the campaigns will inevitably be reexamined by all the political forces without exception after the legislative elections.

Having examined the situation, the Central Committee confirms its previous decisions. The PCP will make decisions concerning the candidate to be put forward, promoted or supported only after the elections to the assembly of the republic.

Irrespective of the decisions which the PCP may make with respect to the candidate, the Central Committee immediately defines as major aims to be achieved in the presidential elections defeating the "Democratic Alliance" candidate and other reactionary candidates and electing a president who will respect and enforce the constitution of the republic.

13. PCP Election Program--Political Aims

The Central Committee reaffirms the PCP's aims and the political proposal to be made to the electorate. The PCP's election program proposes to the electorate a national policy consistent with the Portugal of April which may be summarized in 5 points:

1) a policy of freedom; 2) a policy of development; 3) a policy of prosperity and culture; 4) a policy of legality, stability and public calm; and 5) a policy of independence, peace and cooperation.

In its election program the PCP cites as crucial and decisive points:

a) correcting the reactionary forces' unconstitutional and unlawful decisions and actions; b) improving the living standard of the workers and the people's masses, specifically the most underprivileged sectors and strata (lowest income groups, young people, women, pensioners, the handicapped); c) finally consolidating the nationalization measures and consolidating, continuing and fully implementing the agrarian reform; d) resolving the problems of small and medium farmers and resolving the problems of the intermediate classes and strata (white-collar workers, technicians and small and medium businessmen and industrialists); and e) guaranteeing the democratic nature of the news media.

The PCP's election program is fully in keeping with the interests of the people and the country and indicates the policy and the measures necessary for resolving all the major national problems.

14. Revision of Constitution

The Central Committee once more emphasizes the importance of the fact that the Assembly of the Republic elected 5 October will have powers to revise the constitution.

The PCP firmly maintains that any revision of the constitution should be made within the lawful and constitutional framework, strictly respecting the material (principles which cannot be changed) and formal limits stipulated in the constitution itself.

The aim of any revision of the constitution must be, not the destruction of the system, such as the reactionary alliance is seeking, but the strengthening of the system and of the institutions.

The PCP deputies will advocate in the Assembly of the Republic a revision which will maintain the interdependence, balance and complementarity of the state bodies, the mixed socioeconomic system and citizens' rights and freedoms, and which will ensure the institutionalization of the armed forces' participation in national political life.

The Central Committee warns against the recent subversive statements by leaders of the reactionary parties, according to which, if the "Democratic Alliance" secured a majority in the Assembly of the Republic, it would not respect the requirement of two-thirds of the votes for approving amendments to the constitution nor the material limits to revision stipulated in the constitution itself.

The Central Committee emphasizes that any attempts at unconstitutional revision of the constitution are tantamount to attempts at an actual coup and should therefore be combated and thwarted by the appropriate constitutional and institutional means.

15. APU's Unitary Dynamic

The APU is a unitary coalition in which, in addition to the PCP and the Portuguese Democratic Movement, many independent democrats are taking part. Nobody denies the PCP's role in the APU and in its campaign as the principal political force. But the APU's success is largely dependent on the unitary composition of its lists and the unitary dynamics of its campaign. The Central Committee calls on all organizations and party members to ensure that the campaign's initiatives, including the PCP's initiatives, are devoid of sectarianism and as open as possible to the masses and the population.

16. Making Every Effort

While emphasizing the existence of conditions favorable to defeat for the "Democratic Alliance," democratic victory and the strengthening of the PCP and the APU, the Central Committee stresses at the same time that this is a difficult battle, to be won through effort and struggle. Realizing that it is daily losing social and electoral support, the Sa Carneiro/Freitas do Amaral government is seeking to win votes for the "Democratic Alliance" and hamper votes for the democratic parties by means of electioneering propaganda conducted by the government itself, the monopoly over the news media, measures restricting freedoms, the support of the state apparatus, discriminatory measures adopted by the civil authorities and by the police forces, the partisan use of public funds and the most unbridled demagoguery (minimum wage, "distribution of land" and so forth).

The "Democratic Alliance" will not surrender power without attempting all means to keep it. In order to ensure defeat for the "Democratic Alliance," democratic victory, the strengthening of the PCP and the APU and the consequent possibility of a real democratic majority in the Assembly of the Republic and of a democratic government alternative, the commitment, effort, activity, confidence and enthusiasm of all party organizations and members and of all democrats are essential.

One of the election campaign's essential aims must be the winning over broad sectors which previously voted mistakenly for the "Democratic Alliance" to vote for the APU. It is not to be expected that all voters will attend the initiatives of the PCP's and the APU's election campaign. It is necessary for many elucidative and election propaganda initiatives to reach the masses. To this end the election campaign is being opened up to the broadest masses, using methods which ensure direct contact and elucidation.

Taking stock of the vast range of elucidative actions carried out in the preelection period, the Central Committee inferred the existence of a broad movement of popular support for the PCP and the APU which confirms the PCP and the APU as a rising electoral force and indicates the assured prospect of an increase in their poll and their number of deputies. On the basis of objective analysis of the situation, the Central Committee proclaims the real possibility of defeating the "Democratic Alliance" in the 5 October elections. It is necessary to win over through elucidation not only the party's organization but also APU activists as a whole to commitment to election work with this prospect. The electoral battle is already being waged by the PCP and by the APU with confidence in two essential results:

The "Democratic Alliance" will be defeated and will be left in a minority in the Assembly of the Republic and, as a consequence, the Sa Carneiro government will be out!

The APU will rise and have more deputies elected and the strengthening of its representation in the Assembly of the Republic is an essential precondition for a real democratic majority, which will be the basis for the formation of a democratic government. The workers and democrats have grounds for being confident. With the PCP and with the APU April will prevail!

SUAREZ ADDRESSES VOTE OF CONFIDENCE DEBATE

LD251021 Madrid YA in Spanish 17 Sep 80 p 9

[Unattributed report on Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez' 17 September speech in vote of confidence debate in Congress of Deputies: "The Debate: Economic Program and Autonomies"]

[Excerpts] We excerpt the most important paragraphs from the prime minister's lengthy speech and reproduce in full the second part--that is, the proposal which will be voted on at the conclusion of the debate:

I appear before you to seek a vote of confidence in this Congress of Deputies in the manner authorized by article 112 of our constitution. I am using a constitutional procedure of singular importance because I believe that under the present circumstances it is necessary and beneficial for the Spanish people to know the support which this chamber grants to certain proposals of my government concerning some issues essential to our country's life.

Spain has today and will have for some years, if I am not mistaken, four major complex and closely interrelated aims, which any government must tackle with firm and clear intentions but also with the flexibility required by a difficult to forecast evolution. These aims are:

--To surmount an economic crisis which is simultaneously creating inflation and unemployment and profoundly affecting the structure of our production system.

--To implement the constitution and in particular to build the state of the autonomies and improve and coordinate the various public administrations.

--To combat terrorism by legal means, give the security bodies' actions unconditional and effective support and create a psychological atmosphere of public cooperation which will reject all violence and disorder.

--In the international field, to continue to conduct an active, responsible and unencumbered foreign policy, conceived and implemented at the service of Spain's security, independence and territorial integrity and the well-being of the entire Spanish people.

Although to the government the interconnection among these major aims is clear, however superficially they are analyzed, they will not all, however, be subject to the vote of confidence. Considering that it is the government which decides on the contents of the political statement concerning which it deems it necessary to explore the chamber's confidence, it has reached the conclusion that it is necessary to seek a vote of confidence today on the first two matters cited. With respect to the problem of terrorism, this chamber has repeatedly expressed its support by an overwhelming majority for the government's struggle against terrorist activities and allegedly political acts of violence. With respect to the field of foreign policy, this has been responsibly and consistently conceived and implemented in accordance with the Spanish people's permanent interests and repeatedly explained to this chamber as forming part of a well-known overall blueprint--that of the speech of investiture. There is no reason to believe that the viewpoints or the aims have changed.

The Spanish people should know that the increase in oil prices has created, especially in the industrial societies of the Western world, the gravest and most profound crisis since that which was experienced in 1929, the year of the great depression. This is why I would like to point out to the Spanish people from this rostrum that we are immersed in a protracted and intense crisis, which can be channeled but not resolved in the short term, because there are no rapid, easy and brilliant solutions, since this is a crisis which has created an impoverishment of the Spanish economy; a crisis which will require radical changes in our production system; a crisis which is causing a transformation in the balance of power in the international community; a crisis which is calling into question the values system of the developed societies and which will eventually affect and change our very way of life.

And I would like to add that the Spanish economy is more sensitive than other Western economies to the increase of energy prices, because our production system has a greater degree of dependence than that of other countries.

As has already been frequently said--but it is important to repeat to ensure that we realize the problems with which we are confronted--the new increase in the price of oil has meant for Spain between 1979 and 1980 a loss of about 40 percent of national income transferred to the oil-producing countries, an increase of about 5 percent in the cost of living index and a $6 billion increase in our oil imports bill.

A situation of this kind is in danger of becoming accumulative, and so it is necessary to stimulate the level of demand for goods and services to ensure that activity recovers some vigor and that the creation of jobs can be resumed.

The government's basic aim is gradually to set the economy's growth rate at 4-5 percent at the end of a 3-year period, and this will make it possible to create sufficient jobs to reverse the upward trend in the unemployment rate.

Let it be clearly understood, of course, that not all sectors in difficulties can deem themselves qualified to receive public aid--it must be accompanied by the cooperation of the socioeconomic groups concerned--and that reorganization will frequently be impossible without considerable staffing reductions and plant closures.

Complementarily to all this, I must state that agriculture, as a special sector of our economy, will receive the necessary attention of the government which will accelerate the agrarian programs under way and give the sector priority consideration in the public investment programs.

The government intends to make a major effort in the field of demand and employment, but in return if the reduction of inflation is to be continued and if we wish to really ensure that this greater demand will have considerable impact on employment.

It has been decided to regulate the contents and limits of certain rights and freedoms in individual organic laws. For instance, the organic law of religious freedom is already in force, and the debate in this chamber on the legislation regulating the right to personal and family privacy has begun. It would be possible to retain this method with respect to each of the other rights and freedoms. However, it appears more appropriate to handle this matter within the framework of a statute of public freedoms and legal protection. We have been working to this end for some time, and the text of the statute is now ready.

Our constitution entrusts the protection of citizens' rights to the judiciary, and it is necessary to organize rapid and effective channels to ensure that the Spanish people know and experience that their judges and magistrates constitute the most effective guarantee for exercising freedoms. Hence the need to give priority to reforming the state's basic institutions--judiciary and the attorney general's office.

With this we believe that we are also realizing another, equally important aim. The citizen seeking justice needs to see his claim satisfied with all the procedural guarantees but within a reasonable space of time. The government therefore intends to submit to this chamber the necessary bills which will reform the various penal, civil and administrative law procedures with a view to achieving greater rapidity in satisfying citizens' claims.

In any case, I would like to add that in achieving the same aim, the government intends to equip courts and tribunals with the material means necessary for administrating justice in a modern society.

Prime Minister Suarez then sought the vote of confidence in these terms:

As a result of all that I have just set out, the government states that the most immediate aims concerning which it seeks the chamber's confidence are as follows:

1. The government, with the aim of fully realizing jurisdictional unity, the self-administration of the judiciary, the promotion of justice and the defense of legality, will give priority to the draft organic law on the judiciary and the statute concerning the attorney general's office, and will provide the staffing, auxiliary and material means necessary, within budgetary resources, for achieving the effective functioning of justice, the police organization and the attorney general's office.

2. The government will support the enactment of the public freedoms statute to develop their legal protection and to clarify legally in the broadest spirit the uncertainties and contradictions which some aspects of their exercise are creating in practice.

3. The government will submit to the Cortes within the present period of sessions the bill concerning the economic and social council, as an institutional platform of dialogue and deliberation among the principal social agents and interlocutors.

4. The government will give impetus without reservations through the joint transferences commissions to the implementation of the autonomy statutes in force by means of a strict and sustained transference of services, which will be extended as far as is legally and materially possible to the preautonomy bodies.

5. The government reiterates its intention that the process of setting up autonomous communities will be based on the principle of equality--with no exceptions other than those stemming from the phenomenon of cultural differences and the foral [relating to the "fueros"--local rights and privileges] fact of individuality--the principle of the generality of the process itself and the principle of interterritorial solidarity, aimed at safeguarding the final economy of the new state structure and the efficiency and effectiveness both of the state institution itself and of the autonomous institutions. To this end the government will promote cooperation between the state and the autonomous communities, among the later as a manifestation of the solidarity which must inspire its autonomy policy.

6. The government will give impetus to the drafting and enactment of the autonomy statues of the territories not yet possessing them, in such a manner that they can be in force in 1982-1983.

Until the time when the elections to set up the legislative assemblies of the autonomous communities elected by universal surfrage are held, those communities will be able to exercise their legislative powers by setting up the provisional bodies envisaged by their statutes.

7. With respect to Galicia, the government reiterates its intention that the greatest possible degrees of autonomy be attained, similar in their range and contents to those of other communities defined in the second temporary provision of the constitution.

Being receptive to possible political agreements, it also asserts its intention to encourage any prescriptive or interpretative treatment which will eliminate any legal uncertainty in implementing the statute and which will prevent the exercise of powers by the Galician community in a manner different from what is laid down in the statutes of the above-mentioned communities.

In addition, the government will call the corresponding referendum within the lawful time period in order to submit to the Galician people's approval their autonomy statute.

8. With respect to Andalusia, it is the government's intention, if it has the chamber's approval and subject to consultation with the Council of Andalusia, to resort to article 144 of the constitution to achieve through a special procedure the adoption of a statute which will contain the institutions and powers already laid down for the statutes currently in force.

The new government has conducted an examination of the economic situation and has formulated the overall criteria which will henceforth guide its preferential actions within the framework of the preceding program statements.

1. Unemployment is our economy's gravest problem. The entire economic policy will be directed toward creating jobs, within the limits imposed by the struggle against inflation and by the imbalance in the balance of payments. It is necessary to place this effort within a minimum period of 3 years and accept that it will not be possible to change the nature of the situation radically in 1981. The government refuses to coexist passively with the crisis, undertakes to carry out its role uncompromisingly, constantly seeking a just distribution of the burden of the measures which it adopts, and calls on all citizens to cooperate in the work and effort to achieve a common aim--surmounting the crisis.

2. Within the framework of the market economy defined by the constitution, the creation of jobs rests primarily with private investment. But the government must contribute to this task by using the lever which is within its grasp--a substantial increase in public investment. To this end it will begin by setting an example of saving in the public sector, devoting itself tenaciously to curbing the increase in public expenditure in the overall state budgets, administering social security and unemployment benefits with the utmost stringency, organizing the pensions system more justly by determining ceilings and incompatibilities and correcting improper situations, and to postponing some of the defense expenditure envisaged by law. This effort and the larger revenues secured by a judicious increase in indirect taxation will make it possible to finance a public investment concentrated in the fields most favorable to it--such as energy, the construction industry, agriculture and transportation--in which the ability to create employment and to attract private investment is greatest.

3. The government announces its firm determination to oppose taking into consideration any legislative initiatives entailing further increases in public expenditure when the necessary current additional finance resources are not proposed and approved at the same time.

4. The government intends to continue the tax reform in its fundamental aspirations of justice and efficiency, parliamentary discussion of the death tax and the value added tax being urgently needed. At the same time, it will make the adjustments in tax legislation which experience and the situation require, with respect to reassessing [actualization] capital assets, regularizing balances, adjusting tax scales in accordance with price movement and protection of the family and of savings.

5. Together with this direct investment effort, the government will support the revival of private investment, especially in two fields: precise implementation of the national energy plan, preventing administrative, financial or other obstacles from hindering it (in both its conventional and nuclear aspects); and housing construction, by setting up among other measures a financing system which will make possible a rapid increase of activity in the construction sector. In addition and to the same end, the government will assist the development of private irrigated land and the setting up of foodstuffs industries.

6. It is also imperative to promote the adjustment of industrial structures to the changes in society and the economy. To this end the government is firmly determined to undertake in certain sectors the task of industrial reorganization, which will entail a sacrifice for the state, stockholders, workers and the financial institutions.

7. The creation of savings and their correct allocation to the new investments will be promoted by a new impetus to reform the financial system, continuing the liberalization of interest rates, maintaining the envisaged trend in the necessary coefficients and directing an increasing portion of the system's resources toward medium- and long-term credit, with free interest rates and terms. The current line in monetary policy, which ensures a real growth of credit of the private sector without abandoning the aim of the struggle against inflation, will be maintained.

8. With the aim of promoting investment constantly in view, a new effort will be made to alleviate administrative and bureaucratic interventions and obstacles which so greatly hinder the economy's progress, with respect, for instance, to the freedom to expand, to set up and move industries and with respect to the price control machinery.

9. Local action plans will be prepared in cooperation with the autonomous communities, which, among other aims, will pay particular attention to improving infrastructures and services in the countryside.

10. One of the developments capable of stimulating investment is the setting up of a system of labor relations closer to that of the countries among which we live which will enable us to approach their average level of productivity. The government intends to complete the elucidation of the workers' statute to achieve its effective implementation, especially with respect to part-time contracts or those for a specific length of time. The government very positively assesses the progress represented by the interconfederation framework agreement, and, while respecting freedom of collective bargaining, will state the criteria of restraint which should govern the increase in monetary earnings on the basis of forecast inflation, deducting the increases in the cost of imported energy and of additional indirect taxation.

11. Wage restraint is necessary not only for domestic reasons but also in order to maintain our competitiveness on foreign markets, exports, together with investment, will be a preferential aim of economic policy. Only through exports can we pay the oil bill without resorting to a protectionism which, moreover, would be incompatible with the imminent prospect of joining the European Community, toward which the government's actions as a whole should be directed.

Ladies and gentlemen, that was the statement concerning which I seek the chamber's confidence.

However, I would like to add that in order to continue to implement the policies and to carry out all that is set out in the statement, I have deemed it advisable to undertake a change in the government's composition in which I believe I have chosen some of the men with the greatest stature and proven ability among my party's members. In any case, the resignation tendered by Fernando Abril, former deputy premier for economic affairs who helped us to much and so greatly, necessitated a change in the government team.

Moreover, some members of the new government have been given on this occasion the title of ministers of state. It is not a matter of creating hierarchies among ministers. In accordance with some foreign precedents, we have only sought to embark on an experimental path which may surmount rigid departmental structures, opening up the possibility of activating machinery for coordinating some functions which the administration must perform.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have appeared today before this chamber to seek a vote of confidence on the statement which I have just read out. This decision has required that my stance be expressed--and I hope that I have achieved this--precisely and frankly.

On not a few occasions from this rostrum I have called for Spanish political life to be dedramatized. However, I wish my remarks today to express faithfully the anxiety of all Spanish people at this specific time.

I must assert that the crisis which we are experiencing has a high social cost and that the principle of solidarity, reiterated so often in our constitution, leads here and now to sharing that cost. The crisis must be surmounted. But before we succeed in adjusting our economic structures to the new requirements of the increasing cost of energy products, the difficulties besetting us having been surmounted, we must--I repeat--ensure that the impoverishment of everybody does not lead to poverty or hunger for any group. We will therefore adopt the necessary measures to guarantee sufficient assistance and benefits for those who find themselves in situations of need.

I speak with a deep conviction that the Spanish people will not give up being members of a community of free people. No regression will be possible because the terrorists and any groups which plan to destabilize democracy or discredit its values will fail in light of that determination. Everybody's freedom must open itself to responsibility and solidarity in order to be real freedom. Therefore, it is essential that each and every Spanish citizen accept his share of responsibility in a determined mood and in a spirit of self-improvement. We need to work harder and better. Austerity, industriousness and efficiency are the response to the tough challenge of the present situation.

What matters most crucially in the debate which is to begin is not only the vote of confidence which I seek but that the chamber and the government should urge our people to recover in full confidence in themselves and in their future. It is politicians' responsibility to represent their voters but it is also their responsibility to be genuine leaders of the citizens and to create for them a blueprint of coexistence which will clarify and justify in instances such as the present the demand for sacrifice.

Confronted with the crisis, it is not possible to shrug our shoulders, juggle words or preach miraculous solutions. This is a very hazardous and difficult situation, and much determination and also great sacrifices are needed to resolve it. There is no easy solution; there is no immediate solution; there is no comfortable solution. But, ladies and gentlemen, there are possible solutions.

We present-day Spaniards are justified in asking of ourselves an additional tough and demanding sacrifice for the good of our country because we have already had to invest much courage and imagination in order to heal the wounds of history and rediscover the path of peace and coexistence and because what is now at stake is not our country's survival or the essence of a unifying concept of Spain but exclusively our ability to prevail over the difficulties and to respond to the adversities with toughness, determination and firmness. And, ladies and gentlemen, we believe that for this very reason the people should realize that if an additional effort is demanded, this is purely and exclusively for the benefit of the entire Spanish people.

We will have to implement unpleasant and severe government measures entailing savings and a reduction of consumption and immediate expectations; we will have to protect ourselves from a harsh situation. And we will do so with determination, without evading the real scale of the challenge confronting us. But we will also do so without a despair which would be out of place. We will do so confident that we will prevail and not beset by doubts or hesitations. We will do so in the certainty that nothing and nobody will destroy our historic prospects, that neither the economic nor other difficultires will make us retreat and that it is precisely great trials which forge the nations most worthy of deserving that name.

FOREIGN MINISTER SPEAKS WITH GROMYKO AT UN SESSION

[Text] After his meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Muskie, Spanish Foreign Minister Perez Llorca has met his Soviet counterpart, Andrey Gromyko, in New York. For 1 hour they discussed the serious international situation and aspects of bilateral, basically economic, relations.

They also exchanged opinions--which did not always coincide--on the CSCE, which is currently holding its preparatory meetings in Madrid. Perez Llorca also confirmed that they discussed, albeit in a very indirect way, the Soviet proposal submitted late yesterday at the UN to freeze the entry of new members to military alliances. As is known, the Madrid government could raise the issue of Spanish entry into NATO in 1981. On the agenda of international contacts which the Spanish minister is undertaking in New York today are those with his counterparts from France, Cyprus and Senegal, as well as a meeting with the UN secretary general, Kurt Waldheim.

CSCE PREPARATORY MEETING CONSIDERS AGENDA PROPOSALS

LD231248 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1100 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Text] In Madrid the preparatory meeting for the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe today resumed its work with an examination of the Spanish agenda proposal "Structure of Work for the Main Meeting." Sources close to the meeting say that those taking part will have to decide between returning to points 3, 4 and 5 of the agenda, which have been set aside, or continuing with the reading of chapter 2 of the Spanish proposal--which refers to matters of organization, timing and other forms of work--then, having reached the end, embark on a second reading of the text. Observers believe this second formula to be the more appropriate since the whole agenda will in any case be subject to the structure which emerges from the second part.

Spokesman Outlines Timetable

LD251400 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0600 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Although at the Madrid conference itself differences will be maintained--a fact deriving perhaps from the clear positions of the big powers--the Spanish delegation, led by Ambassador Ruperez, has already arrived at an approximation of what the timetable should be. This is what Rafael Esportorno, spokesman for the Spanish delegation, said:

[Begin recording] [Words indistinct] our timetable, which would (?be based) on the 6 weeks before the Christmas (?holiday) lasting from 20 to 25 days [words indistinct] and another 6 weeks approximately during which the second part of the conference (?could take place depending on the demands of the work to be undertaken). The first 6 weeks will be allocated as follows: The first week to speeches of a general nature; the second to addresses by the delegations; the third, fourth, fifth and sixth weeks will be devoted to discussion of the final act. The sixth week will also be devoted to presentation of the new (?obligations) so that the delegates will be able to acquaint themselves with [words indistinct]. The second part, from January onwards, will be devoted to the study of the (?proposals) [words indistinct]. [end recording]

CSSR Proposal Criticized

LD252248 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Text] During today's session of the preparatory meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, delegates from Austria, Lichtenstein and Great Britain, among others, made speeches expressing their opposition to the proposal submitted by Czechoslovakia last Tuesday. This proposal, which was backed by the majority of the countries from the communist bloc, allows a total of 6 weeks for all the work of the main conference, during which both the problems relating to the review of the Helsinki Final Act and the subject of new proposals would be dealt with. The ambassador of Lichtenstein said that 6 weeks is far too short a time if one considers that the preparatory meeting has already been going on for 3 weeks and has produced practically no concrete results.

At this afternoon's session the head of the Soviet delegation, Yuriy Dubinin, spoke. He made a number of statements regarding the content of the polemical Czechoslovak proposal.

Dubinin argued that the work of the main conference, aimed at examining the fulfillment of the Helsinki Final Act, and the study of new proposals, could be carried out in two different and separate phases. This formulation, according to diplomatic sources, has allowed a much clearer interpretation than the proposals submitted by Hungary and Czechoslovakia, and would allow reconciliation with the thesis contained in the Spanish proposal, which has the backing of the Western bloc.

MINISTER FOR EEC COMMENTS ON MEMBERSHIP ISSUE

LD251347 Madrid YA in Spanish 18 Sep 80 p 17

[Maria Merida interview with Spanish Minister for Relations with EEC Educardo Punset Casals: "Joining EEC Is an Historical and Cultural, More Than Economic Phenomenon"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Excerpts] [Question] What is the present state of the various stages of negotiations on our entry into the EC, bearing in mind the grave obstacles which arose in this connection a few months ago?

[Answer] Apart from these obstacles which have arisen over the last few months, the important thing now is the attitude which could manifest itself, even as a result of the economic crisis itself, which is increasing the difficulties, since less enthusiasm for membership can be detected in certain economic sectors. In fact, one of my first tasks will be to explain in detail that the matters which we must resolve in order to extricate ourselves from the crisis are the same matters which we must resolve in order to enter the Common Market. And this is the first domestic obstacle which we must surmount.

[Question] In your opinion, what are the Spanish economy's major problems today?

[Answer] I believe that there are two fundamental problems: The first is how to attain the future; that is, how to collectively create a vision of the future which will create confidence and assurance that things will really happen just as we say they will. The other major problem is this great country's entry into Europe, or as I term it, "entry into the outside world," one aspect of which is joining the Common Market. This is not only an economic but also a cultural problem. It is viewed from this perspective that our linking ourselves to Europe seems unevitable.

[Question] What is the most difficult aspect of this entry into Europe and our linking ourselves to it?

[Answer] There is nothing easy here, but, as a problem, it does not seem to me something impossible. In my opinion, the most difficult aspect is simply keeping alive the Spanish economic and social sectors' vocation and interest in membership, especially during the toughest months of the negotiations, to prevent hope from being lost.

[Question] Have we now reached that tough time?

[Answer] Yes, because it follows those obstacles which arose a few months ago.

[Question] Do you believe that the state of mind of the French will change, to the effect of putting no more obstacles in our way and supporting our entry into the EEC?

[Answer] I believe so, but nevertheless, it would be little use for France to support us if that vocation and that interest in joining Europe weakns on our part.

PAPER CRITICIZES U.S. PRESSURE ON NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY

DW260758 Zurich NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG in German 25 Sep 80 p 23

[Article signed Bue.: "Bern as Washington's Scapegoat?"]

[Text] The Carter administration is presently trying to wrestle an agreement from the U.S. Senate to supply enriched uranium to India. At the same time, the same Carter administration is launching a barrage against Switzerland, a publicized barrage which also makes use of indiscretions, because Swiss firms are supplying Pakistan, not with fissionable material or with "sensitive" technology for producing nuclear bombs, but with industrial products for general use, albeit very valuable products.

The Carter administration admits that by issuing export licenses for these goods, Switzerland in no way violates the "letter" of the nonproliferation treaty. But the administration imputes that Switzerland is violating the "spirit" of the treaty, because the products supplied to Pakistan could possibly be indirectly used for building a nuclear bomb.

Thus the nuclear power United States plans, for foreign policy reasons, to supply an Asian country, which according to official statements intends to build nuclear bombs, with the important fissionable material despite the nonproliferation treaty and despite its own legislation on nuclear exports of 1978. On the other hand, Washington talks about "punitive measures" against the nuclear have-not Switzerland, because it exports industrial equipment to other states, Argentina or Pakistan for instance, which can be used for building nuclear energy installations, among other things, but which is not listed in the nonproliferation treaty.

The arguments advanced by the United States are hardly credible. When the treaty on the "nonproliferation" of nuclear arms became effective in 1970, many governments, including somewhat belatedly Switzerland, signed the document, expecting that it would help avoid having many countries get hold of nuclear arms. This expectation combined with the hope that the big powers would, on the one hand, reduce their stocks of lethal nuclear arms and, on the other, facilitate the peaceful use of nuclear energy. The treaty expressly established the "inalienable right of all parties to use nuclear energy for peaceful purposes without discrimination."

It is this equal right of the parties to the treaty which is threatened in practice, if the suppliers of nuclear fuel refuse to issue transport licenses with the obvious intention of cornering or even eliminating unwelcome competitors in the sector of technological, non-nuclear equipment. At the second revisioning conference on the nonproliferation treaty in Geneva recently the Swiss delegation stated rightly (and with the broad approval of other states) that the plan to achieve the nonproliferation of nuclear arms by restricting the civil use of nuclear energy was unrealistic. Chicanery against a small country which has no nuclear fuel resources of its own and strictly adheres to the agreements would bring about nothing in this respect. Instead efforts need to be undertaken elsewhere to abolish the political reasons for building nuclear arms.

All things considered, there is the unpleasant impression that Bern has become the current scapegoat of the Carter administration for domestic or election reasons. This role fits poorly into the picture of close confidence which characterizes Swiss-U.S. relations in the light of the fact that Switzerland represents the U.S. interests in Iran. A settlement of the present differences with the renunciation of unilateral pressure would seem to be invaluable to both sides.

GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTATION USED BY FIRMS TO GAIN ARAB TRADE

LD [illegible] Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 20 Sep 80 p 11

[Vagn Petersen report: "Foreign Ministry Used in Trade Boycott of Israel"]

[Text] Danish firms are abandoning Israel and carrying on a trade boycott against the country. The aim is to give in to the enormously rich Arab oil nations and thus achieve export advantages.

The Arab nations are simply fighting fire with fire. The announcements to the Danish exporting firms are cynically clear: "If you want to trade with us, you must have nothing to do with Israel."

Denmark has always supported Israel officially, but unofficially the Foreign Ministry is giving the trade boycott the "seal of approval." The Foreign Ministry legal department has quite simply confirmed the existence of the documents which Danish export companies present to the Arab nations. The documents make it clear that the company in question has nothing to do with Israel.

The procedure is as follows: Before a Danish company contacts an Arab country, it goes to the Federation of Danish Industries and has a certificate made out that describes in detail the company's ownership and its production and trading partners. When the Federation of Danish Industries has completed the certificate it is passed on to the Foreign Ministry legal department, which confirms and certifies that the document in question from the Federation of Danish Industries and the company is "authentic." Both the Federation of Danish Industries and the Foreign Ministry Legal Department have confirmed this procedure for AKTUELT.

The Arab nations attach great importance to the Foreign Ministry's seal of approval. But Birger Abrahamsen, who is administrative chief of the legal department, does not think that this means that the ministry has approved the "legal contents" of the document which renounces Israel. "I do not think that we are lending our name to anything. But I do not want to dispute that the current procedure can be described as a trade boycott," Birger Abrahamsen said.

The background to the Danish double standard in relations with Israel is the so-called "Arab blacklist." Here all the Arab countries have made it clear that they do not wish to trade with firms which have contacts with Israel. Only Egypt goes against this blacklist principle. But, according to Erik W. Svenningsen of the Foreign Ministry Trade Department, there is considerable variation in how firmly individual nations apply the principle.

"It is an extraordinarily sensitive problem," Erik W. Svenningsen said. "Officially we do not acknowledge the principle of a boycott against Israel. But we can do nothing. If we want to trade with the Arabs, we must fulfill their conditions." "Fortunately they are not all so strict. But we have seen cases where merely a single delivery of goods to Israel has made Arabs see red." "And we have been approached by firms included on the blacklist which are desperately trying to have their names removed. But it is not always sufficient for them to be able to document their lack of contact with Israel at the present time, if they have traded with the country in the past."

Erik W. Svenningsen confirmed that it is only in connection with the Arab nations that Danish export firms are forced to renounce relations with a third country. Nowhere else in the world do firms come up against this problem. AKTUELT tried yesterday to contact Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen to obtain his comments on the trade boycott, but the minister could not be reached.

RADICAL LIBERAL PARTY MEETING DISCUSSES DEFENSE ISSUES

LD240859 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 22 Sep 80 p 5

[Unattributed report: "Radical Liberal Party Wants To Cut Defense Budget"]

[Excerpt] At the Radical Liberal Party's annual meeting in Nyborg the party's parliamentary group was given its new directives for possible participation in a new multiparty defense agreement. Such an agreement must aim to cut defense spending, and the minimum demand will be a so-called "zero-solution"--on the conditions that there will be no expansion of NATO depots in Denmark, that a commission be appointed to look into alternative proposals for a new defense plan, and that draft legislation be presented on instituting expert research in Denmark into peace and conflict. Radical Liberal Party Defense Spokesman Jens Bilgrav Nielsen announced at the annual meeting that defense plans in the future would have a duration of 1 year. Defense Minister Poul Sogaard denies this. A proposal that Denmark should withdraw from NATO was almost adopted, but was defeated.

CENTRAL PARTY LEADER CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT STOCKPILING STANCE

[Ottar Julsrud report: "Security Policy an Argument for Change of Government"]

[Excerpt] At a press conference yesterday Center Party Chairman and parliamentary leader Johan J. Jakobsen said that developments in the field of security policy are fast becoming one of the best arguments for a change of government. Jakobsen said that the choice of Trongelag for the contingency stockpiling of U.S. equipment gives the impression that the government attaches greater importance to political than to military considerations. He also considers the internal split in the Labor Party to be greater than the differences otherwise common among the nonsocialist parties.

Jakobsen said that at the moment the government has enough to do fighting for the principle itself--that there will be contingency stockpiling--within its own party. However, it has had to abandon the recommendations from the Defense Commission and from military experts to choose northern Norway for contingency stockpiling, he pointed out. The new Center Party draft program states that the situation must be righted to permit swift deployment of allied troops in a crisis or war, and Jakobsen left no doubt about what that would mean as far as his party was concerned.

SOVIET MINISTER EXPRESSES INTEREST IN NATURAL GAS SALE

LD251343 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 24 Sep 80 p 33

[Richard Plate report: "The Soviet Union Wants To Sell Gas via Finland"]

[Text] The Soviet Union is actively interested in selling Sweden around 4 billion cubic meters of natural gas per year--the equivalent of 4 million tons of oil--Industry Minister Nils G. Aasling told SVENSKA DAGBLADET from Moscow. For the project the Soviet Union is seeking to cooperate with Sweden on everything from construction machinery to pipelines.

This picture took shape at a meeting on Tuesday between Deputy Prime Minister I.V. Arkhipov--a dominant figure in the Council of Ministers when it comes to international trade--and the Swedish industry minister. Nils G. Aasling described the discussion as extremely concrete, although not yet binding.

"The project we discussed concerns Soviet natural gas sent via Finland to Sweden, and not the continental alternative," he said. "Soviet gas is already being piped as far as the River Kymmene in eastern Finland. What is needed is an extension pipeline through southern Finland. It would be a Finnish-Swedish project, which we will discuss with the Finns without delay."

Arkhipov was also interested in discussing the possibility of involving Swedish industry in the supply of materials for the natural gas project and also raised the question of cooperation with Sweden in converting coal into liquid fuels. The price of the gas was not discussed however.

"The question will be discussed again very soon," Nils G. Aasling said, "namely when the Soviet oil minister comes to Sweden in around a month's time. The gas negotiations with the Soviet Union have gone like a rocket in this round of talks. Yuriy Brezhnev's visit to Stockholm in the summer was the start. Then there was Swedegas's visit to the Soviet Union and now these talks."

The industry minister pointed to the considerable potential for large natural gas supplies that the Soviet Union has. The 4 billion cubic meters can be compared with the 540 million under the Sydgas project (gas from Denmark to Sweden). In the earlier unsuccessful talks with the Soviet Union on gas deliveries 4 billion was the "magic" number--such a quantity would justify the large investments in pipelines and infrastructure.

On Tuesday Nils G. Aasling also had a meeting with Deputy Foreign Minister V.F. Maltsev--former ambassador in Stockholm. Their talks covered international oil supplies in the light of the hostilities in the Persian Gulf and their consequences for international security.

NAVY FUEL ALLOCATION CUT; NATO PARTICIPATION AFFECTED

LD251552 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1328 GMT 25 Sep 80

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defense correspondent]

[Excerpts] The Royal Navy's fuel allocation is to be slashed by up to 30 percent in a Defence Ministry economy drive, according to authoritative Whitehall sources today. Already two navy warships have been pulled out of a NATO exercise in the Mediterranean at the end of this month because of the cutbacks. The Defence Ministry, confirming that fuel cutbacks were being made, said that some small-scale exercises by the fleet would be involved. "Every effort to minimise the impact on the NATO effort will be made," said a spokesman.

The Defence Ministry, faced with possibly spending pounds 650 million over its original budget this year, has taken a number of economy steps, including a ban on new defence contracts. The Treasury grudgingly raised its cash limits by more than pounds 200 million but pointed out these new limits must not be exceeded. The fuel cutbacks will affect all three services and, together with restrictions on the movement of freight and both servicemen and civilians employed by the ministry, will save an estimated pounds 100 million this year. A spokesman said: "Essential operational activities will, of course, continue. There will be some reduction in activities." The precise implications of the cut in fuel allocation has not yet been worked out but "the level of participation is bound to be affected." But the spokesman confirmed that the frigates Apollo and Berwick will not join the NATO exercise, codenamed Display Determination 80, in the Mediterranean at the end of this month because of the fuel cutbacks. Now only the two leander-class frigates Aurora and Argonaut will be joining the NATO fleet, together with the royal yacht Britannia (acting as a hospital ship) and the supply ships Tidepool and Regent.

The fuel cutback will be constantly under review according to the ministry. But it is understood the move could put in jeopardy the navy's next planned deployment to the Indian Ocean and Far East. It will also mean navy warships tied up in port for longer periods, according to sources.

HONORING OF IRA TERRORISTS' IN U.S. SCORED

[James Allan dispatch: "Boston Honour for IRA Men Angers Ulster"]

[Excerpts] Belfast--A decision by the Massachusetts state legislature to bestow honours yesterday on two IRA men was described as "deplorable and disgraceful" by Mr James Molyneaux, leader of the Official Unionist Party in Ulster. A similar attack came from Mr Seamus Mallon, deputy leader of the mainly Roman Catholic Social Democratic and Labour Party, who said: "They obviously don't know much about the people who are contributing to the welfare and life of Northern Ireland if they bestow honours on those whose aim it is to take life to achieve their political ends." The two men, Francis McCann of Belfast and Liam Carlin from Londonderry, both served sentences for terrorist offences in the Maze Prison near Belfast.

Mr Molyneaux said he had repeatedly warned the government about allowing Irish-American influence to affect its handling of affiars in Ulster. Officially the Northern Ireland office at Stormont Castle had no comment, explaining that the matter was one for the Foreign Office, but Mr Atkins, the Ulster secretary, and his staff, were said to be not pleased with the Boston terrorist party.

ATAKOL OPPOSES MAVROMMITIS AS UN COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN

TA191409 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1300 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol said that those who elected Greek Cypriot representative [to the United Nations] Mavrommitis as chairman of the UN Human Rights Committee do not yet understand the realities of Cyprus.

Commenting on the election of Mavrommitis to the UN Human Rights Committee chairmanship for the second time, Atakol said that Mavrommitis is the Greek Cypriot administration's representative at the United Nations and that having this status he cannot represent the whole of the island. Atakol added that Mavrommitis can only represent the south of the island and the Greek Cypriots. Atakol said: It is sad and bitter that Mavrommitis, who represents an illegal administration, which for years usurped the human rights of the Turkish Cypriots, which imposed an inhuman economic embargo on the Turkish Cypriot community and which pursued a policy of genocide against the Turkish Cypriots, has been elected chairman of the UN Human Rights Committee. Those who have elected Mavrommitis to this post, unfortunately, do not yet understand or are unwilling to understand the realities of Cyprus.

I KATHIMERINI CITES COMPLICATIONS IN TALKS WITH BRITISH

AT251424 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 25 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] British Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher left for Belgrade yesterday on conclusion of her official visit to Greece. Prior to her departure Mrs Thatcher expressed her deep satisfaction over her visit and said she was impressed by the spontaneous expressions of friendship. It was reported both by the British as well as by the Greek side that the talks were successful on political issues but that complications arose over economic issues. On political issues, according to British sources, Mrs Thatcher said that on the NATO issue she shares the views of the Greek Government that uncertainty has gone on long enough.

Mrs Thatcher was seen off at the airport by Prime Minister Rallis, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and other dignitaries.

The Economic Talks

Greek-British talks which reached no practical results during Mrs Thatcher's visit here, will be resumed in a few days with more favorable prospects for reaching an agreement.

British Secretary of State for Trade Nott will arrive in Athens on 12 October as the guest of Coordination Minister Boutos. Greek-British negotiations will be resumed during his visit with an examination of offers submitted by the British side for the sale of electric generating plants, oil, coal and generally on the participation of British interests in a number of public works (electrification of railways, postal reorganization and so forth.)

According to yesterday's reports, complications arose during the negotiations conducted here during the 3-day visit of Mrs Thatcher and the two sides agreed to postpone further negotiations until 12 October. An authoritative government personality who was questioned yesterday on the progress of these negotiations characteristically stated: "The issues were not yet ripe for an agreement."

According to our information disagreements centered upon:

1. The cost of two 300 kW thermoelectric power stations offered by the British. Their cost, estimated at 17 billion drachma, was considered unprofitable by the Greek side and a request was submitted for a discount of at least 20 percent which the British refused.

2. The supply of coal for the operation of the two power stations. The British did not accept the Greek conditions which provided for the signing of a long-term agreement for the supply of coal at a predetermined price which would be readjusted annually on the basis of a mathematical formula. The British refuse to bind themselves and they counter proposed annual or 2-year agreements.

The Political Issues

In reference to the question of Greece's return to the military wing of NATO and the relevant discussion of the issue during the Greek-British talks, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis explained that "the Greek Government has not yet received any proposal from General Rogers." Authoritative government sources added that it was stressed to Mrs Thatcher that Greece is willing to return to NATO under the condition that it will not return under a status which is worse than that which applied when the country withdrew in 1974. The same circles further revealed that it was stressed to the British Prime Minister that the presence of U.S. bases in Greece depends upon Greece's return to NATO and that from this point of view the visit of Mrs Thatcher was useful.

A memorandum was presented to the British prime minister by the Athens Humanitarian Association which expressed its concern over the continuation of the current situation in Cyprus.

CUMHURIYET CITES POSSIBLE EFFECT OF COUP ON CYPRUS TALKS

NC220649 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 21 Sep 80 p 3

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "Cyprus on the Agenda"]

[Excerpts] The resumption of intercommunal talks in Cyprus, the plenary session held every September by the UN General Assembly and the takeover by the armed forces in Turkey have all coincided. Let us hasten to add that the takeover by the Turkish Armed Forces is not an element that will directly or negatively affect the intercommunal talks in Cyprus. Let us stress another point: The Turkish Cypriot side cannot be blamed for the long delay in resuming the talks. For a long time, the Turkish Cypriot side had been expressing readiness and willingness to resume serious, substantive talks along the lines of the Denktas-Makarios agreement for a settlement based on a bizonal federation. The unduly long delay in resuming the talks is due to the unwillingness of the Greek Cypriot side to accept the Denktas-Makarios agreement in principle. It would be an unexpected development if the Greek Cypriot side comes to the conference table this time with a genuine desire for a peaceful settlement based on the principles of independence, nonalignment, territorial integrity and a bizonal federation. Meanwhile, no one should be surprised if Kiprianou as well as Greece try to use the situation in Turkey as a means of favorable propaganda. Both Greece and Greek Cypriots never failed in the past to use any event as a weapon against Turkey. We must not forget that they might choose the same path now.

FRENCH PREMIER BARRE ARRIVES FOR VISIT, MEETS WITH KREISKY

AU251540 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 25 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

["Raymond Barre as guest in Vienna: Great Airport Reception for French Head of Government--Extensive Exchange of Ideas"]

[Excerpts] France's Prime Minister Raymond Barre arrived late yesterday afternoon [24 September] for a 3-day official visit to Austria. Barre and his delegation were received at the airport by Federal Chancellor Dr Bruno Kreisky, Foreign Minister Dr Willibald Pahr and Health Minister Dr Herbert Salcher. The French prime minister is accompanied by his wife Eva, Minister of Environment Michel d'Ornano and by Olivier Stirn, state secretary in the French Foreign Ministry. After his arrival the French prime minister proceeded to the Imperial Hotel. In the evening Federal Chancellor Kreisky gave a dinner in the Congress Hall of the Federal Chancellery.

The program for the visit is particularly intense today: There will be a visit to the Vienna Town Hall and to the federal chancellor, an inspection of the treasure chambers, a reception by the federal president and a subsequent luncheon at the Hofburg Castle, a reception for the French community at the embassy, and a visit to the state opera.

Envisaged for Friday are a visit to parliament, talks with the federal chancellor, a press conference at the residence andshortly before his departure a return luncheon at the French Embassy.

As reported from the prime minister's entourage, Barre will not sign any agreements during his visit to Vienna. But the prospects for a bilateral collaboration in the technical aviation sector will be a topic for the talks. In replacing its Swedish Saab aircraft, the Austrian Air Force has a choice between the French "Mirage 50" and the American "F-16."

In addition to problems of economic cooperation, Barre will most likely also encourage a promotion of cultural relations between France and Austria.

Comments on Poland

AU251545 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1000 GMT 25 Sep 80

[Text] At a banquet for French Prime Minister Barre in Vienna, Federal Chancellor Kreisky advocated intensified assistance to Poland. Kreisky stated that all democratic countries had the obligation to help Poland even though the system there was different. Barre also spoke in that sense. The French Government head pointed out that France is ready to render support to Poland in these difficult times which could enable the state to overcome its problems.

DIE PRESSE PREVIEWS OPENING OF MBFR TALKS

["22d MBFR round: No Agreement Expected"]

[Text] Vienna, (APA)--Fixing joint ceilings for the troop strengths of NATO and the Warsaw Pact is the goal of the 22d round of the East-West negotiations on troop reductions in Central Europe (MBFR). The talks opening in Vienna today must be looked at with rather dampened expectations because weighty differences still exist: The Warsaw Pact contests the Western estimates about the East having a superiority of 150,000 men: at the same time, NATO is being reproached for playing up the quarrel over data and the "geographic factor" (the USSR is closer to Central Europe than the United States is).

SCHMIDT ON IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT, CSCE, ELECTIONS

LD261140 Hamburg DPA in German 1037 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 26 Sep (DPA)--Together with its allies the Federal Government does not assume that the Straits of Hormuz will be closed. Speaking at a press conference in Bonn today Chancellor Schmidt gave an assurance that no consultations have taken place between the Federal Republic and other countries about sending a joint naval formation to keep the Straits open. Schmidt affirmed the Federal Government's view that German Armed Forces would be used only within the NATO area.

At his press conference, which took place 2 days after that given by CDU/CSU candidate for Chancellor Franz Josef Strauss, the chancellor appealed to all states to avoid widening the conflict between Iraq and Iran. He is convinced, he said, that the free movement of shipping in the Straits of Hormuz will continue. At the same time he drew attention to the talks between Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko in New York during which the principle of noninterference was emphasized.

The U.S.-Soviet negotiations on the limitation of nuclear medium-range missiles, due to begin in Geneva on 13 October, represents in the view of the chancellor considerable success by the Western alliance and especially the Federal Government. In this context, Schmidt drew attention to the German contribution to bringing about NATO's two-part decision last December, to his Moscow visit together with Foreign Minister Genscher, Genscher's subsequent meeting with U.S. President Carter, his--Schmidt's--exchange of letters with Soviet head of state and party Brezhnev toward the end of summer, and to the consultations on medium-range missiles within NATO.

Concerning Poland, the chancellor stressed that notwithstanding differing statements by opposition spokesmen, the Federal Government will stick to the principle of noninterference.

Schmidt said despite the present grave circumstances, the followup conference of the European security conference due to be held in Madrid in November should take place. Bonn emphasized the importance of this conference by the participation of its Foreign Minister Genscher.

The Federal Government will press for the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act in all its parts and "baskets", and the renunciation of any attempt at "glossing over." Furthermore, Bonn is in favor of an East-West conference on energy, more meetings between peoples from East and West, and a disarmament conference for the whole of Europe which, according to the French proposals, must provide for confidence-building measures throughout the European continent.

According to Schmidt the SPD must secure a further 500,000 votes by 5 October in order to achieve its second most important goal of becoming the strongest parliamentary party in the Budestag. It seems, the chancellor said, that every fifth voter had not yet made up his mind, while of the young voters it was every fourth. He warned that the fact that about two thirds of all people in the Federal Republic had for months expected the SPD/FDP coalition to win the election might have a somewhat lulling effect.

On the effect of the arguments put forward in the election campaign, Schmidt said the CDU/CSU's charge of cheating old-age pensioners had not taken hold. Nor was the "character assassination of the Deutschmark" being taken seriously. Schmidt is apparently more concerned about the CDU/CSU's allegation about a "Moscow group" within the SPD, which he called a vicious slander. About his opponent, the CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor Franz Josef Strauss, Schmidt said that the CSU was right when it said the elections should bring about a turning point in German affairs. An election victory by Strauss would mean "a turn toward strife and isolation."

REACTION TO U.S. PROPOSAL ON OIL SUPPLIES TALKS 'POSITIVE'

LD261544 Hamburg DPA in German 1423 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Bonn (DPA)--In view of the war between Iraq and Iran, the United States has proposed joint discussions by leading Western industrial nations on secure oil supplies. A spokesman said in Bonn today that the Federal Government's reaction to the proposal for such consultations between the United States, Japan, Great Britain, France, Italy and the Federal Republic was positive.

The spokesman said that contacts with the United States had revealed the intention that these six countries should, as a precaution, discuss "at a working level" possible shipping problems with a view to secure oil supplies. According to the spokesman, military questions do not enter into the considerations concerning such a body which will hold discussions at the level of officials. Nor had a suggestion for a summit conference of these countries been put forward.

KOHL CONSIDERS INTERNATIONAL NAVAL FORCE IN MIDEAST

LD261530 Hamburg DPA in German 1428 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] Hamburg (DPA)--According to CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl, the proposal that an international naval force should be sent to cruise in the Middle East crisis area should be given careful consideration. However, it should preferably not be a NATO naval force, Kohl said in an interview with tomorrow's BILD ZEITUNG. German participation in a UN force, on the other hand, was "a totally different matter." He did not think that the Germans could refuse "if the United Nations asks us to serve world peace in a region" which, because of the oil, was of far greater importance for the Germans than other places in the world.

POLICE INVESTIGATE OKTOBERFEST BOMB BLAST

LD270922 Hamburg DPA in German 0650 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Munich/Hamburg/Karlsruhe, 27 Sep (DPA)--During the bomb attack at the Munich Oktoberfest on Friday evening, at least 12 people were killed and 140 injured, some of them seriously. This was stated this morning by a spokesman of the Bavarian Criminal Investigation Department (BKA). Some of the injured have been placed on the critical list. However, no exact figures are available as of this morning. Among the 12 dead are 2 women and 3 children aged between 6 and 10. Federal Republic Prosecutor General Kurt Rebmann told DPA in a telephone interview at about 0330 that so far there are no indications that the culprits belonged to any known right or leftwing extremist group. Nothing is known yet about the motive. Rebmann and a spokesman for the Federal BKA hinted that the FRG's security organs have been put on full alert following the bomb attack. They refused to elaborate, however. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, in telegrams to the Bavarian Minister-President Franc Josef Strauss and the Munich chief mayor, Erich Kiesl, has expressed his condolences on behalf of the Federal Government. He promised that the government would do everything in order to help solve the crime. Strauss and Federal Justice Minister Hans-Jochen Vogel, former chief mayor of Munich, visited the scene of the explosion.

Barre Defends Arms Sales

[Text] A comment by Raymond Barre who is packing his suitcase in Vienna ready to leave for Paris at the end of his visit to Austria: Mr Barre spoke about the Iranian-Iraqi conflict to our special correspondent (Dominique Souchier) and clarified rumors regarding the alleged French delivery of arms to Iraq:

[Begin recording] We have always had political relations with this country based on trust. Iraq, as is France, is attached to its independence, and the problem of arms sales is a quite limited one within the whole of the Iraqi-French cooperation. I would also like to say once and for all to those who are interested in the sale of arms by France to kindly bear in mind the sale of arms by other countries. It state in the most clear-cut way that in this respect we do not intend to be given a lesson by anyone. [end recording]

Francois-Poncet Cited on Uranium Deal

[Text] France recently supplied Iraq with an initial charge of less than 12 kg of 93-percent enriched uranium--which could be used for military ends--intended to operate a small nuclear reactor ("critical simulator") which French companies had built in the nuclear research center which Paris is supplying to Baghdad. Without extremely sophisticated technology less than 12 kg is notably below the amount needed for use in a nuclear weapon.

In his New York press conference on Wednesday, 24 September, French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet said that Franco-Iraqi nuclear cooperation has purely peaceful aims "despite all the reports which have been published in various places." The minister also said with regard to French arms sales to Iraq that there is no reason to refuse a country arms when it could procure them elsewhere. "I do not believe," he continued, "that the policy of a country which threatens to halt its supplies on the slightest pretext contributes to peace."

Furthermore, the JOURNAL OFFICIAL for 24 September publishes Mr Francoi-Poncent's reply to a written question from Francis Palmero, centrist senator for Alpes-Maritime, on the dangers of France's decision to supply highly-enriched uranium to Iraq: "The supply of highly-enriched uranium to Iraq is not an exceptional case," the minister states in particular, "since almost all research reactors operating in the world, especially most of those supplied by the United States, use this type of fuel. It is merely in keeping with the needs of the research reactor supplies, is planned accordingly and is surrounded by all the necessary precautions."

Mitterrand Analyzes Conflict's Causes

LD261329 Paris LE MONDE in French 25 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Speaking at the PS parliamentary day held in the National Assembly on Tuesday, 23 September, Mr Francois Mitterrand discussed the international situation. After pointing out that the Soviets are not alone in supplying arms to Iraq and that France in particular "is arming that country to a large extent," the PS first secretary said it is "unwise to say that Iraq has joined the Soviet camp." Analyzing the reasons behind the Iranian-Iraqi conflict which, according to him, can now be called a "war," Mr Mitterrand said that the simplest explanation seems most plausible, namely that it is "an Iraqi operation taking advantage of the contradictions existing among other countries," Iraq wishing to be seen as a "leader" in this region. "At the territorial level," he added, "this war cannot go very far."

Expert Views Superpowers' 'Caution'

LD261549 Paris LE MATIN in French 23 Sep 80 p 9

[Text] French International Relations Institute member Philippe Rondot, commenting on the Iraqi-Iranian conflict for LE MATIN yesterday, said that the striking aspect is the "great caution" being shown by the two superpowers, the USSR and the United States: "It has been widely suggested that the Americans were manipulating Iraq, but I do not believe that is so. They are probably rubbing their hands with glee, but Saddam Husayn is hostile to a U.S. presence in the region and has clearly said so. The Iranians are too proud to allow themselves to be manipulated either by the Americans or the Soviets. That does not rule out the fact that this crisis benefits the United States.

"Moreover everybody wants Khomeyni's fall, especially the Soviets. The Tudeh could take advantage of the situation to change things and could wait for the government to be weakened and then put itself forward as a successor. That is in keeping with its usual line. Theoretically the Soviets could help the Iraqis, at least in the logistical sphere, since they are bound by a friendship treaty. However, relations have been undermined by the Baghdad regime's policy against the communists and by the hostile Iraqi stance on the invasion of Afghanistan. Moscow now seems to be counting more on Syria and Libya than on Iraq.

"However, Iraq seems to have started well. I do not think that it will occupy Iran or will touch the oil wells. Iran, however, is likely to find itself rather isolated."

Armenian Group Claims Responsibility

NC262011 Paris AFP in English 1956 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 26 Sep (AFP)--The Turkish Embassy press attache here was shot and seriously injured in the western Paris suburb of Boulogne-Billancourt today, police said. The "Armenian Secret Army Organisation" claimed responsibility for the attack. Police said they were alerted by an anonymous telephone call and found the envoy lying in a street. He had been shot behind the ear with a heavy calibre weapon, police added. Armenian groups have claimed several attacks against Turkish diplomats in Western Europe.

Police said that the attackers of the attache, named as Selcuk Bakkalbasi, 53, opened fire as he returned home and was climbing the staircase. He apparently managed to crawl out in into the street or was dragged from the building by his attackers. Mr Bakkalbasi also suffered other less serious bullet wounds. Doctors treating the Turkish diplomat at a Paris hospital would make no comment on his condition.

The terrorist organization has accused the Turkish Government of "the genocide of the Armenian people."

GISCARD D'ESTAING'S POPULARITY RATING DROPS

WA261400 Paris LE MONDE in French 20 Sep 80 p 13

[Text] For the first time in a year, the people dissatisifed with the president of the republic outnumber those satisfied with his performance, according to the France-Soir IFOP monthly popularity poll. This survey, published 19 September, was conducted between 5 and 12 September among a representative sample of the French population aged 18 and over, on the basis of 1,800 interviews.

The percentage of those satisfied went from 44 in July to 41 in September and the percentage of those dissatisfied went from 40 to 42. The president's rating is therefore one point on the negative side. His standing had been constantly positive while Chirac was premier. Since Barre's arrival in Matignon, Giscard's rating has been negative on seven occasions: in Oct (-2), November (-2), and December (-8) 1976; in January (-4), April (-1) and May (-6) 1977; in September 1979 (-4). In December 1976, 47 percent satisfied were counted.

Barre's populatity rating remains mostly negative at a level of -21 (52 percent dissatisfied, 37 percent satisfied), although he has gained two points since July when he had a -23 rating (53 percent dissatisfied, 30 percent satisfied).

ANNIE KRIEGEL EXAMINES DYNAMICS OF POLISH CRISIS

LD261429 Paris LE FIGARO in French 24 Sep 80 pp 1, 4

[Annie Kriegel article: "Poland: Illusions and Reality"]

[Text] Some 3 weeks after the initialling of an agreement in which the only victor was thought to be the whole of Poland and nothing but Poland--working class, Catholic and socialist Poland together and indivisibly--it is already clear that things do not end there. The "new evolutionism" has come up against the same question as all evolution--what price should be payed for a change which would not seem to be minor or ephemeral?

Why this lack of illusion when Prague cherished illusions throughout a spring? For two broad sets of reasons.

First because the dynamism of the Polish crisis could not be exhausted by a victory which was certainly stunning but localized and, hence, fragile. Quite the reverse; it was revived and is now developed in an insidious, impetuous and logical way, affecting the two main actors whose stature and reciprocal relations constitute precisely what is at stake.

In addition, following the working class's example, the other components of Polish civilian society are opening out, waking up, verifying that they exist and that they too could do more than simply exist. Henceforth it is not only the church but the (free) trade unions which embody and give structure to this Polish civilian society.

It is in this that socialist Poland's main originality lies; moreover it is here that the paradox of socialism in its communist version has dwelt for a long time--while it was above all a European view of mankind's future--a relatively advanced society with a working class which was aware of itself was needed if the aspiration to socialism were to take off.

However, once the revolution had been carried out this relatively advanced society became an obstacle to the party's aim of occupying the entire public scene in place of and on the ruins of that society. Indeed, although cruelly truncated by the war and the postwar period, systematically excluded from power, repressed and stifled, Polish society, unlike societies in other socialist experiments, was nonetheless not reduced to a pulp: It did not emerge intact from the catacombs but has kept enough substance and memory to know what a structured civilian society capable of functioning looks like.

For instance it is sometimes said that the formation of the Polish working class essentially only dates from the recent period of industrialization within the socialist regime; that is true if it means that there has in the past few decades been a considerable increase in the number of industrial workers who have emerged from the rural exodus, as was the case in Western Europe in the fifties and sixties. However, it is completely untrue if you disregard the fact that there has been a Polish working class, aware of its own existence and organized, for 100 years; and that it had even caused a great deal of concern and worry to German and Russian social democracy in the Belle Epoque. In addition the Polish diaspora has helped ensure that the memory of this is not lost.

The other actor carried along by the crisis is the Communist Party itself--a communist party which, as formerly in Hungary or in Czechoslovakia, is vacillating between heroic, obstinate or resigned steadfastness, self-decapitation, mutation and collapse. There is no mystery in that aside from the one which Corneille [French dramatist, 1606-1684] analyzed: "They were set on plunder. They encounter war." Plunder? The Polish political class's corruption is not a local speciality; it is a fully generalized characteristic of any communist regime.

The fact that the political elite in a communist regime is really drawn from the people and is sometimes even strictly working class does not mean it is any less endowed with outrageous privileges. It is just that the protective barriers isolating the elite in power and ensuring that it profits from its extortion are usually inseperable and there is nobody within the elite who stands to gain from giving the game away. There has to be a need to switch from the requirements of collective salvation to the requirements of personal salvation for more precise information suddenly to be supplied.

The System's Logic

The dynamics of the Polish crisis have not been exhuasted but, conversely, the constraining nature of the world communist system's logic is still as demanding as ever. It must have been self-evident to any communist leader in the world that the major concession of recognizing a trade unionism which is de facto and de jure independent from the party must in some way or another be eroded, undermined and eliminated.

The discussion on relations between the trade unions and the Bolshevik party was closed exactly 60 years ago in the fall of 1920. Communist government is of essence monopolistic or otherwise it is nonexistent; any counterforce, however localized, in civilian society is a threat to which it is sometimes necessary to adapt (as is already the case with the communist government in Poland which has had to accept the church) but within bounds which must be respected.

We can be sure that if Gierek felt any scruples in this matter, Brezhnev does not. One sometimes wonders why the Soviet Union has tolerated some deviations by Romania which is, however, completely surrounded by socialist countries which are totally loyal to the Soviet Union. This is because the deviations in Romania have never concerned the orthodoxy of relations between the party and civilian society; in its internal aspect the Romanian political system conforms perfectly with dogma.

The communist world's supreme leader has no scruples about his own responsibilities either. Even Khrushchev, who made innovations in many areas and even categorically strayed from orthodoxy never hesitated--as is shown by his twofold success in the fall of 1956 on the internal front in Budapest and on the overseas front at Suez--on the significance to be attached to detente and its fundamental principle: peaceful coexistence.

Peaceful Coexistence?

Peaceful coexistence means both constant East-West negotiation to avoid tragic clashes but also the freedom to pursue concerted action unhindered by any status quo in the West; on the other hand since what has been established in the socialist camp has been established once and for all, no concern connected with the need to preserve detente must lead to toleration of attacks on the status quo in the East.

That is why the Soviet Union--which, as everybody knows, was so enthusiastic and interested in the development of economic trade between East and West--now feels no embarrasment in showing the same enthusiasm--but this time in its indignation--in condemning imperialist interference in the shape of the Polish debts connected with that trade and even making major financial sacrifices in order to replace Western capital in Poland, which is henceforth undesirable, with socialist capital.

That is why the Western discussion on the role which detente played in sparking off the Polish events is marginal rather than uninteresting: The Polish crisis is taking its place in the series of crises which are essentially endogenous to the communist world; furthermore Western influence on the Eastern countries' future stems less from the policy pursued by the West than from the model of freedom and prosperity which Western society offers.

COSSIGA GOVERNMENT DEFEATED IN SECRET VOTE ON ECONOMY

AU271725 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Text] Rome, 27 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian Government headed by Premier Franceso Cossiga stepped down today after its defeat in the lower house secret ballot vote on the coalition's economic austerity program. Cossiga tendered his resignation to Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani who has presidential functions in the absence of President Sandro Pertini currently on a tour of the Far East.

Fanfani acknowledged Cossiga's resignation and informed the president of the situation in a telephone message. Pertini announced in Hong Kong that he will immediately return to Italy to handle the crisis and has postponed his state visit to Jordan.

The Cossiga government, which has been in office since April 4, was brought down by a "double vote" which has no precedents in the history of the Italian Parliament. The votes were on the government's decree on measures for curbing creating jobs, which have monopolized and polarized political debate in the nation since July. The decree was voted down by only one vote, 298 opposed and 297 in favor.

The unexpected defeat of the coalition of Cossiga's own Christian Democrats, Socialists and Republicans was the work of about thirty DC deputies who crossed party lines and voted with the opposition, taking advantage of the parliamentary rule requiring a secret ballot vote on government decrees. Fearing the possibility of "sharp-shooters" within his own ranks, Cossiga had earlier called for a confidence motion (which is voted on by voice vote) on the ninety articles of the decree lumped into one single article. The coalition parties voted compactly on the confidence test and the government easily passed with 329 votes in favor and 264 opposed.

Fifteen minutes later, the tables were turned on the government and the ruling arrangement was defeated by a single vote. The "sharp-shooters" broke ranks and decided to bury the decree and also the Cossiga government. Immediate reactions in the lower house after the upset were that the government's resignation was a foregone conclusion.

"The Parliament sacked the government", Communist deputy lower house Communist Whip Abdon Alinovi said. The chairman of the right-of-center Liberal Party Aldo Bozzi said that the "government substantially had already fallen: This is the official declaration of its death".

Only a half hour later, the imminent crisis was confirmed with the [word indistinct] that Cossiga had convened the cabinet for an immediate session. The meeting was very brief. Cossiga and his ministers agreed unanimously that there was no alternative to stepping down after Parliament [word indistinct].

President's Comments

Talks on New Government

AU290845 Rome ANSA in English 0810 GMT 29 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Rome, 29 Sep (ANSA)--Italian chief-of-state Sandro Pertini starts a round of consultations here later today for the formation of a new government. Government-formation procedure in Italy calls for the president to consult first with former chiefs-of-state, so the first to be filing into his office this afternoon will be Giuseppe Saragat and Giovanni Leone, his two immediate predecessors and the country's only living former presidents. Next will come Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani and lower house Speaker Nilde Jotti. The president will consult with political party leaders tomorrow and then take time out on Wednesday to think about the results of his probes assigning the job of putting a new government together to a premier-designate.

Cossiga paid a call on Pertini last night as soon as the president returned from his visit to China and formally turned in his resignation. Pertini reserved the right to decide whether or not to accept it.

The two men met earlier in the evening when Pertini debarked from his flight from Hong Kong, where he was on a private visit on his way home from China when news of the government crisis reached him. Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani and lower house Speaker Nilde Jotti also went to the airport to meet him along with Foreign Ministry Undersecretary Giuseppe Zamberletti and Chinese Charge d'Affaires Huang Yuping.

The president declined to make any comment about the Rome government crisis, limiting his remarks to his recent five-day visit to China. "The visit went very well", he declared. "It was a trip that gave me great satisfaction", he added. "I believe we have planted our seeds well," Pertini said, "now we'll have to reap what grows". The president's plane made a fuel stop in Dubai Sunday. The United Arab Emirate's vice presidential cabinet chief, (Sheikh Rashid ibn Humed Drai), and Italian Ambassador Antonio Napolitano were at the airport to greet him.

Financial Restrictions

AU290910 Rome ANSA in English 0823 GMT 29 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Rome 29 Sep (ANSA)--The bank rate in Italy was 1.5 percent higher today than it was when the banks closed Friday and [it is] the highest in Europe. Treasury Minister Filippo Maria Pandolfi raised the bank rate to an unprecedented 16.5 percent and ordered a series of currency restrictions last night in response to the Rome government's weekend debacle. Pandolfi explained his move to hike the bank rate in terms of the potentially-damaging effect that "expectations generated by the veto on the economic measures and the government crisis" could have on the currency market. In other words, the move was basically aimed at offsetting the speculative tensions that a sudden flow of liquid assets on the market would create in a politically shaky situation marked by high inflation and mounting foreign debts.

The Treasury Ministry also took the following precautionary measures to protect the lira against speculative manoeuvers during the government crisis.

Foreign currency amounts will be good for no longer than ten days at a time. Exporters must deposit a surcharge of fifty percent of the value of their foreign sales in order to obtain advance payment on invoices.

For its part, the Foreign Trade Ministry instructed the Italian exchange office to enforce the following rules:

Debts stemming from commodity or service imports with advance payment may not be redeemed before the terms of the contract allow. Foreign currency loans granted to residents of the country may not be paid out ahead of the terms laid down in the contract.

COLOMBO COMMENTS ON MEETING WITH GROMYKO AT UN

QU271216 Rome ANSA in English 0805 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Excerpts] New York, 27 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has culled confirmation that the Soviet Union and the United States intend to remain absolutely neutral in the fighting between Iraq and Iran in talks on the fringe of the United Nations General Assembly here.

Two days ago, Colombo met with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and, yesterday, with Secretary of State Edmund Muskie, and both officials confirmed the intention of the two superpowers to keep out of the fighting. Colombo also had long talks on the Middle Eastern crisis in general with U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim, Egyptian Foreign Minister Butrus Ghali, and Israeli diplomatic chief Yitzhaq Shamir.

After the briefing with Gromyko, Colombo told reporters that Italy, like everyone else, had no reason beforehand to believe a war was looming over Tehran and Baghdad. "Only a fortnight ago, Iraqi Vice-President 'Izzat Ibrahim ad-Duri was on an official visit in Rome and at no time did we ever have any reason to fear what later happened," Colombo told reporters.

He added that Gromyko told him the Soviet Union would not interfere in the affair and the United States gave a similar solemn pledge when the Soviet diplomatic chief met with Muskie, Colombo reported. Gromyko and Colombo also discussed other topics of the moment such as Afghanistan, disarmament, and bilateral relations, the foreign minister said. "The Soviet position on Afghanistan has not changed," said Colombo. "Gromyko left no loophole for a political solution to the problem". Gromyko told him that the Soviet troops will leave Afghan territory when incursions from Pakistan and Iran cease, after which it will be up to the Afghans to chose their future, Colombo reported.

During his meeting with Colombo, Gromyko once more voiced harsh criticism for NATO's decision to deploy Pershing-Two and cruise missiles in Europe. But, even if Gromyko said that the Soviet Union is going to the negotiations in a constructive spirit, Colombo said he did not seem optimistic over the changes for progress.

According to Colombo, the Soviet diplomatic chief was more positive towards the idea originally proposed by French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, and later backed by the European Nine, for a disarmament conference covering all Europe as far as the Urals.

The Soviet Union agrees with the idea, Colombo quoted Gromyko as saying, because the Soviet Union believes, in any case, that the path of negotiations is the path to follow. The two ministers agreed that Italo-Soviet relations are good, in both political and economic terms, and said they would meet again as soon as possible.

FOREIGN MINISTRY SPOKESMAN DISCUSSES SOVIET REQUESTS ON CSCE

LD261016 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] The Spanish minister of foreign affairs, Jose Pedro Perez Llorca, arrived back in Madrid a few minutes ago from New York after having attended the annual assembly of the United Nations. Mr Perez Llorca, who said that he would be taking part in the cabinet meeting at the Moncloa Palace within a few minutes, did not meet with journalists since he was unable to make any statements. He delegated the task of clarifying the content and aim of his meetings with other foreign ministers in New York to the director of the Diplomatic Information Office of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs [Antonio de Oyarzabal y Marchesi].

Mr Oyarzabal said among other things that the Soviet Union had asked Spain to be a more active host at the Madrid security conference, to prevent the United States and the Western countries from including in the Madrid security conference the problem of Afghanistan and human rights. Spain replied that it would be an active host, but that it would be closer to the Western resolutions than the pro-Soviet ones.

The Spanish minister agreed with Lord Carrington, the chief of British diplomacy, to increase and elevate the level of the Lisbon accord on Gibraltar. The British specifically asked Spain to let the border be opened as soon as possible. The minister answered that the border would not be opened if a conclusion was not reached on all pending problems.

FISHERIES MINISTER LEAVES FOR BRUSSELS TO PROTEST EC OVERFISHING

LD261601 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 25 Sep 80 p 16

[Per Nordurmreport: "Norway Warns EEC Against Continued Illegal Fishing"]

[Text] Brussels, 24 Setpember--"It is embarrassing that the EEC's internal problems in dividing fish quotas are leading to overfishing in Norway's part of the North Sea," an official of the EEC Commission Fishing Department admitted to AFTENPOSTEN. Norwegian Fisheries Ministry Under Secretary Ivar Kristoffersen will once again warn the EEC of the consequences of continued illegal fishing in Brussels on Thursday.

The under secretary will arrive in Brussels after visits to Copenhagen, London and Bonn on the same mission: EEC fishermen have so far taken three times more mackerel than they are allowed. The EEC quota amounts to 6,400 tons. The Danes alone have taken 10,200 tons, while the other EEC countries have taken almost as much together, it is now admitted.

If the EEC continues to overfish, Norway is threatening to ban all EEC fishing in the Norwegian 200-mile zone. Earlier this month Norway terminated the mackerel agreement with the EEC recorded in the minutes of the negotiations between the two parties. An agreement on a quota is pointless if no one is making any attempt to stick to it. diplomatic sources said.

"The commission has sent notification of the situation to the member countries," and EEC official said. He hopes that Norway will take no further steps in the matter, since it is not in the two parties' interests for the conflict to be exacerbated. The EEC is keeping a low profile in the matter. EEC sources point out that the EEC has at least kept that part of the agreement that gives Norway access to fishing in EEC waters, as the quota agreement stipulates.

Has the EEC reported its catches to Norway, as the agreement stipluates, and have those reports been good enough?

"We have submitted catch reports. The collection of data is not good enough, so the figures have perhaps not been totally up to date," the EEC official admitted. He added that each party under the terms of the agreement controls its own fishing and that reporting is seen almost as a supplementary activity, to see to what extent the quota figures are being adhered to. "You cannot say that the EEC has a duty to report its catches, since we are here dealing with minutes of negotiations and not a signed agreement."

The EEC contravention of the mackerel quota is blamed on the fact that the EEC Council of Ministers has not adopted binding regulations and has not shared out between the member nations the quotas that the EEC has been granted in the Norwegian zone. If the EEC--as is the goal--reaches a common fisheries policy before the year is out, the problems in relations with Norway will be solved almost automatically, the EEC spokesman said. The most important question concerns our own internal control arrangement, he admitted.

Norway has stressed that it is doing its best to keep to the quota agreement with the EEC, and that fishing is stopped when the permitted quota has been taken. Up to now EEC fishermen have for the most part continued fishing without regard to gross violations.

The North Sea mackerel quota has decreased markedly in recent years, from 145,000 tons in 1978 to 55,000 tons this year. This year Norway has a quota of 44,000 tons.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON DEFENSE ADMINISTRATION REORGANIZATION

LD250901 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 22 Sep 80 p 5

[Erik Liden report: "Stricter Central Control of Defense Materials Purchases"]

[Text] The Swedish Defense Materials Administration (FMV) is to be radically reorganized. Five hundred employees will lose their jobs, and close ties with the various branches of the defense forces will be cut.

This is the result of an investigation that former Defense Ministry Undersecretary Gunnar Petri will present to the government in 3 weeks' time, SVENSKA DAGBLADET was heard.

Defense Minister Eric Krosmark is skeptical of the ideas which Petri is putting forward. Kroesmark thinks that the present organization in three main divisions each attached to a branch of the armed forces is unsatisfactory and wants to look at purely technological divisions. These would deal with aircraft, missiles, vehicles, artillery, ships and so forth.

The FMV was set up in 1968, when the old army, navy and air force materials administrations, together with the armed forces quartermaster administration, were made into one organization. Despite repeated investigations and staff reductions from 4,500 to 3,700 at present, FMV has only become a single unit in theory. Its activities have not been integrated, and each branch of the armed forces continues to develop and buy its own materials completely independently and without cooperation. There is today, for example, a missile department in the army, one in the navy and one in the air force.

Eric Kroesmark decided therefore in the fall of 1979 that radical new steps must be taken. In order to achieve more efficient materials purchasing, stronger leadership powers for FMV Director General Ove Ljung must be created.

In addition to the staff reductions that the government and Riksdag have approved--a decrease of 600 by 1984--Gunnar Petri wants to make a further reduction of 500 staff members by 1990. That would leave 2,600. The Petri report will be presented to the government on 14 October and will be controversial. Especially in the air force, since the dominant role of aircraft in materials orders is greatly reduced. Petri proposes that all missile development be given to the army and all electronics development to the navy. In this way the present main division for air force materials would work directly on only aircraft and helicopters. Integrated missiles and operations control systems would in the future have to be bought from the missiles experts, who would be under the direction of the main division for army materials. However, the responsibility for coordination would remain with the air force.

The naval missile project, Missile 15, has already been given an experimental integrated project leadership, and this seems to have turned out well.

Gunnar Petri thinks that in this way there is no risk of the army view of missiles dominating the development work. On the contrary, he thinks that the central planning body in the FMV and also Director General Ove Ljung will have a greatly increased chance of controlling development.

The Swedish chief of staff and the heads of the three armed forces have not yet been given a detailed account of Petri's proposal, but according to SVENSKA DAGBLADET's information, Air Force chief Dick Stenberg is very critical.

"It is important to move carefully so that the reorganization does not give rise to conflict between the branches of the armed forces," Defense Minister Eric Kroenmark said. "This is why I have difficulty envisaging a half-way solution, such as this report is proposing. Either one main principle must hold, as for example the present division into the three armed force branches with their separate project leaderships, or we must invest directly in technological divisions with an expanded management body under the general director. In the future it should be possible for the general director to be a civilian and have an officer as a deputy. In addition there ought to be a chief director in a post of chief of the central planning department, where all purchases would be submitted and decided on. This would not happen, as it does today, in the various main sections. In this way unnecessary duplication of work would be avoided. However, in the last few years criticism of FMV has been wide of the mark."

Eric Kroenmark rejects the idea of implementing changes within the present organizational framework: "That would be worse than today. We must now make our activities more effective and integrated. Technological divisions are one solution. It is not possible to mix two organizational principles--that would only lead to inefficiency."

Army General Ragnar Persson, who is chief of the central planning body, is one of the strongest advocates of the new organization. He was the expert involved in Petri's investigation. He told SVENSKA DAGBLADET: "The proposal is not fixed, but there is much to recommend that vehicles and missiles are given to the army, ships and electronics to the navy, and aircraft and helicopters to the air force. In this way each branch of the armed services will be given two interesting areas of technology on which to work."

Gunnar Petri: "The commander-in-chief must be able to have tighter control over the expensive purchase of materials. FMV must be able to have a form of control over industry completely different from the one it has today and be able to follow up projects in greater detail. The contracts that are awarded to industry must cover a greater area of a particular project and must lay greater responsibilities for development on industry. It is not possible to buy almost 4 billion kroner worth of defense materials per year at random. However, technological divisions are impossible as long as the commander-in-chief has four separate staffs. This would need an integrated defense staff."

KIPRIANOU RETAINS LEADERSHIP OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY

NC271207 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Text] Mr Kiprianou, president of the republic and chairman of the Democratic Party [DIKO], said in a statement today that following many consultations, serious thinking and responsible pondering he has reached the decision to remain in the leadership as chairman of DIKO as he has been elected by the party's congress. Mr Kiprianou went on to say: I sincerely believe that, particularly under the present circumstances, this is dictated by the country's interest. He added: It would probably be easier for me to retain only the office of the president of the republic, however, I have discerned the absolute need to continue rendering my services also as chairman of the Democratic Party, which is called upon to play a serious role in the country's political life and our national cause in particular.

In his statement Mr Kiprianou calls upon all DIKO leading members and organs as well as all its members and followers to rally together and be vigilant in order to positively and substantively serve the people's interests and our national cause. He also says that the Democratic Party will pursue its expansion and revitalization--wherever needed--so that it may constitute an invincible force in the sphere of the center and progressive rightwing, which the party aspires to cover fully. In conclusion, Mr Kiprianou says that he will deal more extensively on DIKO's role in the country's political life--as this is outlined today and in the future--with emphasis on the national issue and the internal situation in his speech before next Friday's joint meeting of the party's political bureau and district committees.

In a statement after a working luncheon with President Denktas and the Turkish ambassador, Mr Batu, today, Mr Bilge said his visit would last a week and was the continuation of a recent visit to the federated state by the Turkish foreign minister, Mr Turkmen. Referring to a meeting in New York between the foreign ministers of Turkey and Greece early next month on bilateral relations, Mr Bilge said that it would be in the interest of Greece if the talks were held regularly.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON CONTACTS IN NEW YORK

AT271525 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1500 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Text] Summarizing his impressions from the talks he has had with the foreign ministers of France, China, India, Sweden, the USSR and the United States, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis made the following statement to Sotiris Yeoryiou, Armed Forces Television Service correspondent in New York:

[Begin video recording] We conducted a general review of international problems, we discussed the bipartite relations between each country and Greece and I had the opportunity to explain to all of them the current phase of Greek-Turkish relations and to brief them on the dialogue being conducted between Greece, Cyprus and Turkey as well as to raise and discuss the question of inter-Cypriot dialogue.

I should tell you that in reference to the Cyprus issue I established that a desire and a wish is being expressed on all sides that the inter-Cypriot dialogue should be promoted and that it should be fruitful.

I could tell you also that I hope that the Greek views in reference to our bipartite relations with Turkey and specifically the effort of Greece toward a positive dialogue with neighboring Turkey reflect the more general spirit of the world today which consists of the wish for a friendly solution of differences.

[Question] Did you discuss other international issues Mr Minister?

[Answer] Naturally we discussed the great international issues with all of them. The issue which is in the epicenter of international interest today is the question of the open conflict between Iraq and Iran. This is the question which is in the center of interest of everyone in New York at this moment. There is a general expression of the hope and particularly Greece expresses this hope, that a way will be found for the soonest possible cessation of hostilities and that the two interested sides sit around a table to proceed toward a solution of their differences through political means, and not through war. "The Lisbon Conference confirmed that we are not simply a leading circle from the southern European socialist parties which simply meets in order to take decisions on international and European problems. On the contrary, we are preparing a program of joint action which will become the object of study and work by leading personalities of the five parties.

"We are about to promote coordinated efforts by all our parties in order to contribute to detente, disarmament and peace; to coordinate our struggle against the right wing, against the oligarchy of wealth which for a long time has organised itself on an international basis and which supports and is supported by international economic organizations and particularly those which are related to international credit (credit policy, investments and so forth.

"Our goal is to coordinate our activities for the further development of democratic institutions, for the expansion and deepening of democracy in all its aspects, parliamentarianism, local self-government and trade unionism.

"In conclusion we all undertake to support with all the strength at our disposal those socialist governments which, sometimes slowly and at other times faster, will take over the government of the countries of south Europe.

State Minister's Departure Remarks

TA261903 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal left for Washington this morning to attend the annual General Council meetings of the World Bank and the IMF. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport, Ozal expressed the hope that he will hold beneficial bilateral talks during the meeting. He also gave information on the economic measures being implemented. Here is the statement made by Ozal before his departure for Washington:

[Begin recording] These measures have intermediate and major goals. Reaching the major goal is a matter of some 4 to 5 years. I have never stated that the problem had short term solutions. Nor do I say so now. However, this does not mean that we shall overcome our difficulties in only 4 or 5 years. The situation can constantly be improved. We shall achieve a healthy economic system within 4 to 5 years. This has only one meaning. This program should seriously be implemented for 4 to 5 years. I can summarize the intermediate goals of the program as follows: To overcome the oil crisis; to eliminate shortages of various goods; to put an end--to a great extent--to black marketing; to speedily decrease the rate of inflation; to improve the foreign currency situation. We have attained intermediate goals. The oil crisis was overcome in about 2 months. There is no question of an oil shortage in Turkey today. A shortage of most goods was to a great extent eliminated by the end of June. There may still be a shortage of various goods at times. However, they are insignificant.

The rate of inflation began to decrease in April. The rate of inflation has decreased to less than 2 percent during June, July and August. This is quite an achievement. As a matter of fact, foreign circles appreciate this achievement. Together with the decrease in the rate of inflation, we have obtained the following significant result through our monetary policy. The difference between the official and the black market rate of exchange of the Turkish lira is very insignificant. Therefore, the foreign currency remittances of Turkish workers employed abroad have increased extensively in recent months. The monthly remittances amounted to $280 million in July and August. This amount is 2.5 times more than the remittances last year. If we examine it we see that this increase in remittances is continuing this month also despite the fact that September is not a month for tourism [as heard]. Though not in the same proportion, there is still a significant increase. We have been able to obtain a certain amount of relief in our foreign currency transfers this a relief which we were unable to obtain in the last 2 to 3 years.

Naturally, another significant development is the change made in the banking system in the last few months. Especially, measures aimed at increasing savings have proved very beneficial. The amount of deposits in our banks in July is close to the amount deposited in a previous 6-month period. This increase in savings will be beneficial for future investments and for an increase in production. I find it beneficial to reiterate the importance of implementing this new economic program for 4 to 5 years. An amelioration of the economic situation can be observed. I have always stated that this amelioration will not be in the form of sudden relief. Our people went through various difficult periods. Relief will come gradually. A gradual improvement means the system is firm. A sudden relief might direct us toward the wrong path.

We are entering winter. There are various changes in world conditions. Therefore, we have to be most careful about our stability program. We should not rekindle the flame of inflation which is gradually being extinguished. Within this framework efforts should be exerted to secure relative relief for the condition of salaried persons. I estimate that legal measures toward that direction can more easily be taken today. Of course, we have to be moderate. If we advance with moderation, we achieve speedier results. Without moderation, we risk setback. We might then be faced with more difficult problems. [end recording]

FOREIGN MINISTRY CRITICIZES FRENCH DECISION ON VISAS

TA271731 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Text] In addition to the FRG, France has also decided to impose visa requirements on Turkish citizens.

Foreign Ministry Spokesman Ambassador Savlet Aktug said that deliberations have been made with the French Government in connection with France's decision regarding visa requirements for Turkish citizens. The Foreign Ministry spokesman said: It is odd that France, our NATO ally, with which we have a partnership within the EEC framework and with which we have always attached importance to maintaining close relations, has made such a decision. This decision is contrary to the spirit of the Turkish-French relations we are trying to improve in every field, and discriminates against Turkish citizens compared with the citizens of other Council of Europe member countries. Furthermore, in ending the implementation of the previous visa agreement, France does not have a reason similar to the one put forward by the FRG to justify its decision.

French Ambassador to Ankara Emile Cazimajou, in a statement to the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, said the decision on visa requirements will be effective 5 October. Noting that transit visas will be required for Turkish citizens transiting France, Cazimajou added: Nothing can be said now as to when this visa requirement might end.

Meanwhile, a draft resolution prepared by Professor Besim Ustunel and various European parliamentarians has been submitted to the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly. The draft resolution calls for the reexamination of the visa requirement imposed by the FRG on Turkish citizens. The draft resolution points out that the FRG decision on the issue is discriminatory against a single member of the Council of Europe and that it is incompatible with the goal of establishing a stronger unity among its members. The draft resolution further notes that the FRG visa requirement is also contrary to the European agreement aimed at facilitating movement among Council of Europe member countries.

Under the statute, the National Security Council will be a check [denetlemek] on the prime minister and the ministers at all times and it will be able to request written or oral information from them whenever it wants.

The related decisions will be made by a simple majority of the Council following general debates, interrogations and investigations. During the process, the Council of Ministers will be able to ask for a vote of confidence.

A simple majority of the National Security Council will be sufficient to oust the Council of Ministers or any of the ministers. Under the statute, the Council of Ministers will be able to decide whether to investigate and prosecute any one of the ministers for crimes committed in connection with his duties or for personal crimes committed before or during his service as minister. The requests of the judicial authorities in connection with such cases will be conveyed to the National Security Council Presidency via the Justice Ministry and the Prime Ministry. The Council will then place the issue on the agenda, study the defense of the concerned minister and take the necessary decision.

Under the statute, the Council will meet at a predetermined time on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays unless it decides otherwise or unless the Council Presidency calls for a meetings.

The statute's article on the vote of confidence states that a debate on the government program is to be started in the National Security Council at the session following the one in which a program was read. A vote is then held after thd debates end. A simple majority of the full membership of the National Security Council will be sufficient for the Council of Ministers to receive a vote of confidence.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL ADOPTS THREE NEW MEASURES

TA261552 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] The National Security Council has adopted three bills, respectively, on the confiscation of unlicensed arms, ammunition and other explosives and knives and similar instruments; the removal from office of mayors; and the abolishment of municipal and provincial general councils.

According to the law dealing with the confiscation of deadly weapons, no legal action will be taken against persons who relinquish such weapons to military and civil authorities within 15 days after the law goes into effect. Persons who do not relinquish their weapons can receive a prison sentence of up to 30 years.

In accordance with two other bills adopted by the National Security Council, mayors have been removed from office effective from 12 September 1980, and municipal and provincial general councils have been abolished.

Law on the surrender of the deadly weapons stipulates that persons who surrender their unlicensed weapons and explosives to military and civil authorities within 15 days following the day the law goes into effect will not be prosecuted. The penalty for those who do not surrender unlicensed weapons and explosives within this period will be increased. All persons who possess, sell, buy or smuggle weapons into the country can receive a prison sentence of up to 30 years. These persons might also be fined up to 20,000 Turkish liras.

According to another bill adopted by the National Security Council, all mayors have been removed from office and all municipal councils have been abolished. This law is effective retroactive to 12 September. According to this law, the duties of the municipal councils will be carried out by municipal committees composed of administrative chiefs as stipulated in the municipal law. Civil servants or retired civil servants, those having professions or mayors who have been removed from office may be appointed as mayors. Appointments will be in line with the wishes of the martial law commanders. The appointments will be made by the Interior Ministry in provincial centers and by governors in other centers. If a removed mayor is reappointed to his post he will sever relations with any political party with which he happens to be affiliated. Municipal unions [belediye birlikleri] may be abolished--their activities may be stopped or they may be abolished--by martial law commanders, governors or the Interior Ministry, depending on the regions in which they are active.

According to another bill adopted by the National Security Council amending the provincial administration law, provincial general councils have been abolished retroactive to 12 September. The duties of the provincial general councils and the provincial permanent committees will be carried out by a four-man council headed by the governor until the members of the new provincial general council are elected. No additional payment will be made to the personnel in this council.

BELGIUM'S NOTHOMB COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH U.S. OFFICIALS

LD291059 Brussels LE SOIR in French 25 Sep 80 p 2

[Jean Pochet 23 September interview in Washington with Belgian Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb: "Nothomb 'Reassures' United States About Missiles"]

[Text] Washington, 23 September--The sky was clear on this first day of fall in Washington for the visit by Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb. On Monday the minister, who will next be moving on to the United Nations to attend the general policy debate, had only two meetings--both important, however, on account of the Belgian Government's decisions concerning details regarding the deployment of the cruise missiles. The first of these meetings was with National Security Council chairman Brzezinski.

Nothomb told us: "We confirmed our position to Mr Brzezinski, who acknowledged with satisfaction our spirit of solidarity and the steadfastness of our commitments to the alliance. We confirmed our position on NATO and the cruise missiles within a general framework."

[Question] Did your interlocutors--Richard Cooper, under secretary for economic affairs at the State Department; Assistant Secretary of Defense McGiffert; and Bartholomew, director of the State Department Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs and chairman of the NATO Special Consultative Group--who also attended the meeting accept your excuses without flinching?

[Answer] They were not excuses but honest explanations. When I remind them that Belgium is a country whose advanced social services make it more difficult, for instance, to meet our financial commitments concerning military spending, it is a fact. Just as it is a fact that for several years we have paid our contribution and even more than our contribution while others have reduced their contributions.

[Question] To be more specific, did you not encounter any objections to Belgium's excuses?

[Answer] I repeat that no excuses were made. But yes, the Americans did ask some questions which we believe we answered to their satisfaction. Our frankness inspires even more confidence inasmuch as we are partners of long standing, and on an equal footing, and we have opened our doors wide to the Atlantic organization.

[Question] Even though the government's original document envisaged the first deployment of missiles in 1983 and the final document makes it dependent on the outcome of the Geneva negotiations?

[Answer] Between Wednesday and Friday several different versions of the document emerged, but the version that was published reflects the consensus of all the sides concerned and I can only repeat that the Americans did not doubt the sincerity of our explanations.

A little later Mr Nothomb met with Under Secretary of State Warren Christopher. During this conversation Belgium's nonparticipation in NATO maneuvers was discussed. Though the under secretary said it was a pity that Belgium has made this decision, he added that every country was free to interpret events as it wished.

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON MIDEAST WAR, ELECTION ISSUES

DW291315 Baden-Baden Suedwestfunk Network in German 1140 GMT 28 Sep 80

[Reporter Reiss interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, war has broken out along a vital oil supply artery for most Western industrial nations and Japan, war between Iran and Iraq. How do you assess the situation, and to what extent is German policy involved?

[Answer] You are right in speaking about the vital oil supply artery being endangered. Not only Europe, but Japan, America, the whole world is involved. Not only industrial countries, but also developing countries are involved. But the decisive danger is that peace has been threatened in the entire region. Danger emanates from this war, danger for world peace. I pointed out several times early this year that the general situation in the Near East, the Middle East; the general situation between East and West has features which remind one of the summer of 1914. Nobody wants to have war between the big powers, but there is the danger of slipping into it. The war between Iran and Iraq contains the danger of slipping into something worse. It is bad enough as such, and it is therefore necessary for the world powers to maintain restraint and to adhere to the principle of noninterference. We Germans act on the principle of noninterference, as everybody knows. We are in full agreement with our American allies in this respect.

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, let us discuss the election campaign. The Union parties feel they are in the updraft of a change in German politics, as they say. But you said in Munich that Franz Josef Strauss lost the elections long ago, and that only the size of his defeat is involved. Would you repeat that today, 1 week prior to the federal elections, and isn't it possible that this slogan could lead to a slowing down of efforts to mobilize your voters? What do you consider a realistic election aim: confirmation of about the same majority you have had in the Bundestag, or do you think the SPD will become the strongest Bundestag group?

[Answer] The most important aim naturally is to continue peace policy at home and abroad. In order to do this we need a majority consisting of both coalition parties. I would welcome it very much if the SPD faction of the new Bundestag were stronger than the CDU and CSU factions combined. The achievement of this aim depends very much on mobilizing the second votes for the SPD. Since about Easter the CDU/CSU has had a slight lead over the SPD.

[Question] Signs indicate that there will be much more vote splitting this time than in the past, that is, the first and second votes being cast differently. Does it irritate you that the coalition will be strengthened through the splitting of votes due to a strengthening of the FDP through the second vote, as some people believe. Is the federal chancellor a coalition fighter, or most of all the supreme election fighter of his party, the SPD?

[Answer] The federal chancellor stands with his own party. I have been a member of my party for 3 1/2 decades. It has appointed me to public positions. Its confidence is my capital. The fact that I will have to set up a social-liberal coalition again after the federal elections is not my personal aim, it is the intention of social democracy as a whole, and it is also the intention of the Free Democratic Party. As regards the splitting of votes, I hope that as many voters as possible will vote for the SPD with their second vote. The number of Social Democratic women and men backing the Social Democratic federal chancellor in the next Bundestag will depend on this.

[Question] Assuming you will again become federal chancellor of a coalition whose partners naturally must show political consideration for each other, let me pick out a major campaign issue--state debts.

I will refrain from saying whether these are good investments for the future or bankrupting measures that will lead to a currency reform, as some Union politicians have been saying in the campaign. But after all, state debts curtail significantly the government's and the parliament's financial room for maneuver. Should the growth rate deteriorate or tax revenues decrease, where will financial policy priorities be set by a future social-liberal government program?

[Answer] The gibberish about bankruptcy and currancy reform has been rejected as just that, gibberish, by all experts in the FRG: By Karl Klasen, the former president of the Federal Bank; by the spokesman of Deutsche Bank; by the spokesman of the German savings banks, and by Hermann Josef Abs. This is not an issue. Mr Strauss no longer talks about it either. He did not repeat that nonsense about a currency reform at the federal press conference last Wednesday. He made it clear that state credits cannot be curtailed quickly. Mr Strauss has finally realized what we have known for a long time.

Through credits we have first taken care of the future through investments in German coal, through investments for coal processing to produce gasoline, gas and chemical raw materials. We have built highways, schools and universities. We have modernized and improved towns, we have built elevated trains and subways, and we have helped towns and laender in this respect. We have built social housing areas and in doing so preserved jobs and created new jobs. 900,000 jobs in the past 3 years.

We did this in full agreement with Catholic social doctrine, which I consider an important and powerful structure of thought which I have used to orient myself several times in the course of my political life. I advise those who do not know this too well to read the Encyclica Mater of John XXIII which expressly demands that the state use all its means to avoid mass unemployment. We have done this. In a similar world economic crisis I would do the same again. I would not be impressed by that gibberish. At the same time we have cousolidated pensions. Pensions are higher in Germany than they ever were, particularly with regard to war victims and invalids drawing a worker insurance pension or a pension from the employees insurance.

We hold a very good position with regard to the debts incurred by communities, laender and the federal budget. Only France is better off in Europe than we are. If it were necessary to take up credits again in a new world economic crisis, we would be in a very good position worldwide. The whole world wants to buy German state bonds. But at present I do not see such a necessity. At present I consider it desirable, and our positions have been made accordingly, to cut down credits in the 1981 fiscal year. That will apply to 1982 and 1983 as well.

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, could you say a few words about what will be stressed in this connection?

[Answer] One of the things to be stressed deals with the fact that credits had to increase so much in the past years because the federal laender were not able to finance public investments on their own, investments that were necessary for employment policy reasons, so that the federal budget had to finance public projects together with the laender and communities. Thay may have to be curtailed. I talked about that months ago in public at the Essen SPD congress. I said this was one of the great domestic policy tasks of the eighties.

The situation cannot continue whereby Mr Strauss and Mr Stoltenberg exploit their Bundesrat majority to continuously apply pressure at every new distribution of taxes so that more is given to the laender at the expense of the Federal Government. They have curtailed the public finances from a previous 54 percent in the early seventies to 48 percent, channelling far more than DM100 billion to the advantage of the laender. That process must be stopped.

[Question] Security policy and peace policy, Mr Chancellor, today rank quite highly among the people and among the voters.

You say that there is no alternative to detente policy, though its continuation probably requires two protagonists, namely, the Soviet Union on the one side and the United States on the other, with their respective allies. Will Moscow continue to cooperate if--and I would like to put this quite carefully--it arrives at the conclusion after Poland that in effect detente policy threatens to destablize the communist system? And, on the other hand, how secure is German-U.S. conformity of views? How solidly anchored is the alliance if and when an entirely different sort of destabilization might threaten from Washington, say, after the presidential elections, as a result of the efforts for strategic superiority instead of military balance? Such balance, as far as you are concerned, constitutes the prerequistie for safeguarding peace.

[Answer] You provided the decisive cue with your last sentence. The prerequisite for cooperation in Europe is military balance. Everything else is of lesser significance. The second prerequisite is political balance. This needs to be preserved in any case. Hence the dual decision of NATO of last December, for example, which is intended to achieve a Western counterweight to the immense Soviet medium-range armament and which simultaneously offered the Soviet Union negotiations on the equal limitation of this missile armament on both sides. For over half a year the Soviet Union refused to respond to this offer of negotiations. It is to the credit of Minister Genscher and myself that Soviet receptiveness to negotiations was attained through our negotiations in Moscow this summer.

During the week that just drew to a close the U.S. secretary of state and the Soviet foreign minister talked again for the first time on when and how, and under what auspices, the negotiations on the limitation of the missile armament on both sides should be reactivated. This really constitutes a great success for German security and foreign policies. In that respect we are absolutely on an identical line with the United States. Naturally it does not happen that we instinctively hit on the same thing all the time and from the outset; rather we talk with each other, listen to each other. The contacts between Washington and Bonn are extremely close.

I will adhere to the prerequisite of balance in the future as well. I think it is wrong for a world power to seek great military superiority over the other. I will not alter this conviction. On this point I feel in full agreement with the U.S. Government which, as far as the SALT II treaty is concerned, continues to insist on the ratification of this negotiated treaty. I call for its ratification, too.

Now, you said that this [detente] might destabilize the communist systems from within. It is not in the German interest to ponder this issue. It is definitely a fact that the more severely the cold war rages, the more people on both sides are forced to subordinate everything to the interests pursued against each other in cold war. The more we succeed in replacing cold war with balance and cooperation the greater become the options of development on both sides. After all, this also is the underlying meaning of the Helsinki agreement made 5 years ago.

[Question] Let us turn to another topic in connection with the Catholic pastoral letter on the Bundestag election and also in the elucidations provided on this letter by Cardinal Hoeffner. You were reprimanded, though not by name, for denying that the political adversary had the ability, albeit not the will, to serve peace. Now if we view this in the light of what you still have emphasized a while ago, namely, how dangerous and menacing the world is in which we live and that we might be facing really serious crises internally--I am thinking of terrorist acts--and in foreign policy, couldn't it be that the situation might arise where we would have to cooperate and where all parties now fighting each other would be forced to get together? What do you propose to do, and what can the other side do in view of these possibilities, to prevent the bridges to each other from being burned and to preserve the capability of joint responsibility?

[Answer] I have not burned any bridges. On the contrary, under the leadership of Willy Brandt and Walter Scheel for the past 11 years we have invited the opposition time and again to participate in the treaties we concluded.

We invited them to join us in voting for the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to the United Nations. They were always against it. If Strauss had had his way we would still be sitting on the spectator's benches today, being the only one among the great nations of this world. Instead, all of us have seen how all the states of the world unanimously elected a German president of the world organization for the next 12 months; an indication of confidence held in the current foreign and security policies of the Federal Republic of Germany. We have not burned any bridges to the CDU and the CSU.

But we do stand by what we have said: What we signed in Helsinki was that we would not interfere in the internal affairs of other states. After all, we do not want others to interfere in our affairs, either. It is a violation of not only the spirit but also the letter of Helsinki that the CDU and the CSU asked me, for example, as the chancellor to please state my views about the events in Poland. I did not, nor will I do that in the future. Should a really difficult situation arise for our people--which I do not see on the horizon at the moment--or should a difficult situation in foreign and security policy respects arise for Germany, we will always ask the opposition to participate in consultations, just as we did in the difficult situation caused by terrorism during the kidnapping of Hanns-Martin Schleyer and during the hijacking of the Lufthansa plane to Somalia.

[Question] You have said, Mr Chancellor, that as the chancellor you intended to state your views concerning the Catholic pastoral letter only after the elections, after the cabinet has been formed. This is why, in conclusion, I would like to ask you as a Social Democrat what ways you see of leading the relationship between the Catholic Church and the Social Democratic Party, which has historical dimensions and which has involved long and difficult efforts, out of its present crisis, a crisis which perhaps is not just of a topical nature. Could the papal visit to Germany and the pope's presumed meeting with the chancellor be helpful in this respect?

[Answer] I have great esteem and respect for this pope, and this is a restrained choice of words. Just recently I had a chance to talk with him in the Vatican for 1 and 1/2 hours. What this pastoral letter involves is not a frontal position against the Social Democratic Party; in any event, it did not harm the Social Democratic Party, nor did it harm the Free Democratic Party. It has triggered serious controversy within the CDU and CSU. It will continue to elicit more controversy within the Roman Catholic Church. At the moment these controversies are still somewhat hidden because they are exercising restraint pending election day. Unfortunately it will also burden the ecumenical cooperation of the churches. Because of its one-sidedness I cannot take the letter as a pleasant contribution.

I have said that I would come back to it; and I will, but after the elections, not before. I am not interested in waging a debate between state and church within an election campaign, nor in a debate between a party and the church. After all, it is not the bishops who are up for election, but either Mr Strauss or the Social Democratic Party and its chancellor, or the Free Democratic Party and Mr Genscher, but not the Fulda bishop's conference.

GENSCHER DISCUSSES FOREIGN POLICY, UN TALKS

DW291655 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 1600 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Correspondent Gasper interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; date, place of interview not given--live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] Minister Genscher, the efforts to stop the war between Iraq and Iran seem to be making very slow headway. Can this conflict be localized, or is there a danger of expansion?

[Answer] It was the foremost task of all states to contribute toward making a localization possible, meaning to prevent interference from without and thus an expansion of the conflict. We must keep in mind that this hotbed of conflict is located in a highly difficult region of the world, highly difficult because other hotbeds of conflict are in the neighborhood, for instance, Afghanistan in which the Soviet intervention continues, and the unsolved Middle-East problem. And finally, this region is of great international interest because of its oil deposits.

Hence it was all the more important that it was made clear in New York through talks not only in the circle of the Western foreign ministers but also in talks with representatives of the Islamic Conference, with the Soviet Union, and with other East European foreign ministers that the first and foremost objective is no interference from any side. I believe that this is an important result of joint international efforts. What matters now as the second stage, is for us to endeavor, and to support all endeavors, toward persuading the two parties in the conflict to sit down at the negotiating table. In this respect the Islamic states might play a part again. By the same token it is important for both the West and East to show awareness of their responsibility for world peace.

In my talks with the Western colleagues I found, first of all, that no differences of opinion whatsoever exist when it comes to doing everything to help halt this conflict as soon as possible. Likewise it became plain in the talks with the Eastern interlocutors--I had a dialogue with the Soviet foreign minister and talks with other East European foreign ministers--that there too, interest prevails in avoiding an expansion of the conflict under any circumstances. Just as impressive to me was my dialogue with the secretary general of the Islamic Conference who himself took the initiative and informed me about the efforts of the Islamic conference toward a settlement of the conflict. What is important now is that all sides adopt a clear and level-headed attitude. This goes to show that our efforts, too, must be dominated by clarity and sobriety as well as by reserve.

[Question] On the other hand, Mr Genscher, you cannot halt such a conflict by talks alone--and you had many talks indeed in New York. You yourself indicated this. What role does the Federal Government play in that respect, anyway: What possible active role?

[Answer] To begin with, it is necessary to inform all sides about one's own intentions and at the same time to obtain a picture of the intentions, interests, and assessement of of interests of the other sides. Viewed from this angle the talks are quite significant. The next step is to try to work toward moderation, a discontinuation of the combat activity, and ultimately toward accords for lasting peace settlements through direct contacts with the two parties involved. In this respect the Federal Government can play a part jointly with its partners in the European Community and its Western Allies. It can play this part also by virtue of its good relations with the states of the Islamic Conference, of course, and last but not least owing to the fact that as a result of the development of our East-West relations we are partners in dialogue of the East also on difficult issues.

I believe that what pays off for us and for the general interest now is the fact that the foreign policy of the Federal Republic of Germany is being assessed by all sides as unequivocal, credible, circumspect and predictable. Only a country that can show such a foreign policy and that enjoys such a confidence in the world on all sides in the world, can also contribute actively to the solution of these extremely complicated problems. I may repeat at this point that nobody intends to push forward here. Yet we will be acting in keeping with our role and the options we have.

[Question] Mr Genscher, you pointed out in the beginning of our talk that there are several hotbeds of crises and that this region is very much in danger anyway. Is it at all realistic to continue detente policy in view of this fact?

[Answer] It emerges particularly in the current difficult situation--I point to the conflict between Iraq and Iran--how important the continuation of East-West talks is, as well as the efforts aimed at detente between the East and the West.

We remember very well international developments in Europe, in divided Germany in connection with Berlin, developments that had a negative effect. I have made it clear in all the talks I had in New York that the conflict between Iraq and Iran must demonstrate how much detente policy can stand. The conflict must not involve Europe, on the contrary. The East and the West must use the existing possibilities of talks among themselves to contribute jointly to a containment and later to the end of the conflict.

[Question] Minister Genscher, the next official opportunity to continue the East-West dialogue will come about in Madrid at the CSCE followup conference. You will head the Federal Republic's delegation. What will be the main points?

[Answer] The Madrid conference is the second followup conference after the signing of the final document of Helsinki. It will offer an opportunity to discuss the implementation of all parts of the final document such as the declaration of principles, problems of economic cooperation, humanitarian problems, problems related to the exchange of information. Eventually we want to negotiate on setting up a European disarmament conference that is supposed to agree on confidence-building measures for all of Europe.

The fact that this conference is supposed to take place now demonstrates again how correct it was of the Federal Government to sign this final document in 1975. It demonstrates simultaneously how wrong the move of the ODU/CSU was at that time, wanting in the Bundestag to keep the Federal Government from signing the final document. Had we done that, we would have been the only Western country that was fully isolated, isolated even from the Vatican, which has signed the final document as we know.

It all demonstrated that with our cooperation in bringing about the final document, an important paper has been created on the basis of which we can try to further develop East-West relations in Europe.

On the other hand, however, one must naturally ask: What do the statements of the CDU/CSU Union mean, statements it makes in the election campaign such as "a foreign policy change," or "a turn of foreign policy"? This creates a number of questions because German foreign policy long ago ceased to be a national foreign policy. It is not at all a foreign policy one can pursue on one's own; it is firmly imbedded in the common Western foreign policy.

Those demanding a change or turn must be asked whether they want to quit the common Western foreign policy. I warn against such risks and experiments. Everything must be done now particularly so as not to let the predictability of German foreign policy be called into question. Our foreign policy must not become the subject of rumors.

[Question] Mr Genscher, a final domestic political question: You procede from the assumption, and the federal chancellor has said this also yesterday himself, that this coalition will be continued after the 5 October elections. Helmut Schmidt said, however, that coalition talks will be difficult. What are the main problems?

[Answer] I consider it as extremely important, particularly in the present international situation, to continue German foreign policy persistently, clearly and continuously. Naturally rather different opinions exist in certain domestic political fields, different opinions of both government parties. We will discuss that after the Bundestag elections in coalition negotiations as always. I am convinced that the will to cooperate and the knowledge about the common responsibility of both government parties with regard to our position in the world will lead to our finding good and constructive solutions for our country.

Call for East-West 'Trust-Building'

LD291429 Hamburg DPA in German 1055 GMT 29 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--The FDP chairman, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, has called for an "offensive of trust-building measures" in answer to the critical developments in the Near East, Afghanistan as well as Iran and Iraq. At a federal press conference in Bonn he said the West could initiate this offensive on which the industrial nations of North, West and East would have to take a stand. He made five points in this connection:

1. The CSCE followup conference in Madrid would have to result in the convocation of a European disarmament conference, "with a clear mandate to decide on trust-building measures for the whole of Europe."

2. The United States and the Soviet Union should push for negotiations on the limitation of medium-range missiles "with great energy." Progress in these negotiations could introduce an additional element of stability into the international situation.

3. After the elections the American Senate should support the American President's efforts for a ratification of the SALT II treaty on the limitation of nuclear armaments.

4. Through a positive acceptance of the proposal for a European disarmament conference, through positive participation in negotiations on medium-range missiles and through the readiness to take up talks on finding a political solution to the Afghanistan question, the Soviet Union should contribute to confidence-building measures in the world.

5. East and West would have to resist the temptation to transfer East-West opposition to the Third World. The test in this is the two sides' behavior vis-a-vis the Iran-Iraq conflict.

Answering a question concerning possible reactions to a closing of the Straits of Hormuz, so important to oil transportation, Genscher said he proceeded from the viewpoint that the states concerned, Iraq and Iran, realized the importance of that shipping route for all industrial nations. With regard to Afghanistan Genscher admitted that there is no proof so far of the Soviet Union's readiness for a political solution.

COMMENTATOR PRAISES U.S. STANCE ON IRAN-IRAQ CLASH

DW291411 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 27 Sep 80 p 12

[Commentary signed G-N.: "Better Taciturn"]

[Text] President Carter announced in Washington the other day that the United States, jointly with other states, was pondering ways of preventing the Straits of Hormuz from being closed as a consequence of the Iraqi-Iranian conflict. Washington's statements on the conflict in the upper part of the Persian Gulf clearly say that the United States does not wish to take sides. This is not contradicted by consultations, jointly with other states, concerning the joint protection of the tanker traffic through the strait. Making plans for emergency cases, consulting the states bordering on the gulf, making accords, keeping naval power standing by--such measures of precaution for the event of an expansion of the war are even imperative. It is likewise imperative, however, to keep silent about them in public and to refrain from providing any cause that might give the Soviet Union a pretext for intervention or that might induce one of the two warring parties to call for Moscow's help in the gulf. If it is necessary at all to talk loudly about naval protection for tanker traffic, the Western countries should concede precedence to the gulf states.

FRANCOIS-PONCET MEETS GROMYKO IN NEW YORK, ADDRESSES UN

[Nicole Bernheim dispatch: "The Islamic Countries Are Going To Attempt Joint Mediation"]

[Excerpts] New York--The UN Security Council members spent 25 September trying to find a means of mediating in the Iraqi-Iranian conflict but without success.

Franch Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet entertained Gromyko to lunch. The informal talks essentially concerned Afghanistan, the Iraqi-Iranian conflict and the Madrid conference. On Afghanistan the Soviets were hostile to any concession, as the speech delivered by Mr Gromyko at the beginning of the week had already demonstrated. With regard to the Madrid conference the French minister specified that Paris is opposed to a repetition of the Belgrade conference and to the debates ending in a show compromise as they did then. However, the Soviet stance scarcely seems to have been modified. Moscow still seems just as reticent particularly on the creation of an "arms control zone stretching from the Atlantic to the Urals," as the French plan delineates.

The two countries' stances on the Iraqi-Iranian conflict proved closer, notably on the need to prevent the fighting from spreading and ensuring free circulation in the Gulf.

General Assembly Speech

LD291421 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Sep 80 p 10

[Unattributed report: "The Afghanistan Crisis Is Disturbing All International Relations"]

[Text] The following are the main passages from the speech delivered by Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet at the UN assembly on Wednesday, 24 September. The minister recalled that last year he had begun by pointing out:

"Throughout the disturbances and dangers which have threatened it, general world peace has been successfully maintained for more than 30 years."

He added, "Why does this remark seem almost out of place today? It is of course because of the events now taking place on the Iranian border which are, quite rightly, in everybody's minds and the subject of everybody's concern today. However, it is really more than 1 year now that the world has been witnessing grave events and our anxiety dates back further than the current conflict. A disturbing process has been set in motion. Although world peace has not been broken, the confidence we placed in the strength of this organization has been shaken. Our peoples and our states have probably never felt the solidarity of their destinies and the fragility of peace so acutely before. Nor has it ever seemed more necessary to counter the blind mechanisms of fatalism with lucid analysis, courageous action and effective structures for international cooperation.

"It would be simplistic and erroneous to attribute the crisis to a single factor. The new factor just introduced by the current military conflict between Iraq and Iran would suffice to recall this. There are many factors contributing to the tension. However, since the Soviet Army's intervention in Afghanistan the crisis has assumed an exceptional nature. The Afghanistan crisis is not just another event. It is much more serious and its implications are much more far-reaching.... Through the tragic trials it is inflicting on 15 million Afghans it is primarily violating a fundamental and universal principle: that of national independence and a people's right to determine its own future. No deceptive portrayal can disguise that fact. What is at stake is the fate of a country and a region whose security and stability are essential to the balance and peace of the world. Finally what is at stake is the behaviour of one of the two powers who along have the means to unleash a world conflict and who, therefore, have special duties.

"The Afghanistan crisis also has another significance. You only have to look at its effects on East-West relations: Detente's course has been jeopardized and its momentum lost, the Madrid conference's prospects have grown gloomier, the question of world conflict and control of disarmament are marking time and are being interrupted. It is futile to think that the Afghanistan crisis can be reduced to its local or regional dimensions. It disturbs all international relations from country to country. The other crises are not escaping its effects--it is increasing their dangers.... If we look only at the last 12 months how can we fail to note once more with sadness that despite the efforts made and despite the progress made through the evacuation of a large part of the Sinai we are still essentially a long way from our goal.

"Furthermore, unilateral and illegal decisions taken by Israel, whether relating to the West Bank or the recent decision on Jerusalem are raising new obstacles to the search for a peace settlement. Finally, what can be said about the attacks on Lebanon's sovereignty and territorial integrity...? Last year we deplored the Vietnamese Army's occupation of Kampuchea in Southeast Asia. The Kampuchean people have escaped extinction thanks only to the international community's vast humanitarian effort.

"Finally, as regards southern Africa, the satisfaction we feel in welcoming independent Zimbabwe's delegation to our assembly cannot prevent us from noting the slow progress and the obstacles which remain on the path toward Namibia's decolonization. Nor can it make us forget that the apartheid system in South Africa keeps millions of human beings in a status which is an offense to human rights and Africa's dignity.

"I will not discuss the latest developments in the Iraqi-Iranian crisis except to say that it is vital to avoid interventions which would give the conflict a broader dimension, to prevent any attack on freedom of navigation in the Gulf which is of world importance and, finally, to encourage the search for a peaceful solution.... However, the picture would be incomplete if I did not also mention the formidable problem which forms the background to these crises: the problem of hunger and developing.

"Solutions do exist. I would even go so far as to say that they are within reach. They stem from the principles on which our international community is based. These principles are laid down in our charter. They propose law as the rule, and dialogue and consultation as the method. The law is self-determination for peoples, independence and security for states, and dignity and equality for men. Dialogue and consultation means refraining from unilateral action and condemning the use of force.... In the four crises hanging most heavily over international relations--the Afghanistan, Kampuchean, Middle East and Namibian crises--despite differing circumstances, the same causes produce the same effects, the same objectives encounter the same obstacles and the same problems call for the same solutions."

"What is the objective in Afghanistan if not the Afghan people's right to freely determine their future? Where do the obstacles lie? First in a foreign army's intervention and second in the temptation to make this country a stake or threat. The first must be ended and the second removed. The two things must be done together. Therefore those states which, because of their proximity or their power, are in a position to influence Afghanistan's future must agree to lift these two obstacles. They must promise to respect Afghanistan's sovereignty, give up trying to draw it into their sphere of influence and more importantly refrain from maintaining or sending in their military forces; that would suffice to give back the Afghan people their freedom, independence, and restore balance and tranquility to the region, and security and hope to the world.

"What is the objective in Southeast Asia if not to free unfortunate Kampuchea from a field of battle in which it is trapped by a confrontation over which it has no control and in which it has no part? The Khmer people did not escape the barbarous oppression of bloody tyranny to submit to another country's protectorate. They have the right to live freely and independently. The countries in the region are entitled to have Kampuchea as a partner willing to practise peace and friendship with all its neighbors.... However, the military occupation must be ended and an agreement be reached for the reemergence of a free, peaceful and neutral Kampuchea....

"As far as Namibia is concerned nobody now disputes that that country must acceded to international sovereignty and that the authentic independence to which it aspires can only be brought about by the free choice of the country's inhabitants.

"Surely what is true in all other parts of the world is also true of the Israeli-Arab conflict? However complex the many elements may be, the basic facts are analogous. Two rights come into conflict over territories on which military occupation cannot confer legality or lay the foundations of peace: Israel's right to security and the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. The assertion of one cannot be based on the negation of the other. Instead of opposing the two in passion and violence they must be reconciled in reason and justice. It will then become clear that, far from being incompatible, they can become complementary if the guarantee of one and the exercise of the other are equally ensured within the framework of an all-embracing settlement based on withdrawal from the territories occupied since 1967 and on universal recognition for Israel's borders. We must prepare the ground for the vital negotiations in which all parties concerned, including the PLO, will necessarily take part.

"In face of the dangers posed by the crises, there is only one reply: law not force holds the keys to peace. Is there any less evidence for that when we look at the threat which the persistence and sometimes the aggravation of underdevelopment poses to the world's future?"

The minister concluded by launching an appeal for international cooperation. "We cannot forget that East-West relations are in many respects still a mainstay. At this level the essential responsibility rests with the two states which are called superpowers because they alone have the power to plunge the world into a general conflagration. Everything depends on their behavior and on their relations.

"My country is the friend and ally of one of these powers. Beyond ideological differences it has relations of cooperation with the other to which it attaches value and hopes to be able to maintain and develop. It did not hide its feelings toward U.S. policy in Vietnam. It is now bound to say that the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan is unacceptable, that no security consideration could justify it and that, in the interests of all and of the Soviet Union itself, it is necessary to find a political solution to the crisis in keeping with the Afghan people's legitimate aspirations and the requirements of international peace.

"Those who possess the most formidable arsenals and who are constantly working to increase and improve them must be the first to stop the arms race. Last year the signing of the SALT II agreements gave us hope.... While I understand to what extent the international atmosphere affects that agreement, I would like to state here once again that my country hopes to see it brought into force as quickly as possible.

"In addition to the world dimension and the East-West dimension of international relations there is now increasingly a regional dimension."

The minister then recalled the "frontline states" role in the Rhodesian affair, the diplomatic initiatives taken by the Islamic Conference, ASEAN and the African countries on Chad, Djibouti, the "Horn of Africa," and the initiatives taken by the EEC.

"The Nine are preparing to take new initiatives. They will continue to do so. However, their action is being increasingly devoted to detente and peace. In face of the growing dangers they can take refuge in indifference and passiveness less than ever before. It is no longer enough for them to make their voice heard. They have decided to make their presence felt. This is the meaning and significance of the mission which their president, Mr Thorn, has just made to the Middle East on their behalf."

In conclusion Mr Francois-Poncet stated: "Do not be surprised if France's voice is now taking on a serious tone: Conflicts are spreading and growing more difficult to solve, international dialogue, when not being broken off is not being opened; whether it be the issue of detente, disarmament, or peace it is as if the world did not dare either to reject the principles or ensure the progress of these issues. By giving its remarks the significance of a warning and an appeal today, France is remaining faithful to its traditions and its vocations...."

GOVERNMENT CALLS ON IRAQ, IRAN TO END HOSTILITIES

[Text] The Italian Government had expressed deep concern over the stepping-up of the conflict between Iraq and Iran. PCI DIRECTORATE ISSUES RESOLUTION ON IRAQ-IRAN CONFLICT

[Apparent text of PCI Directorate 24 September resolution: "Communists, Utmost Commitment to Peace"--first paragraph is L'UNITA introduction]

[Text] The PCI Directorate yesterday approved the following resolution:

"The prime duty in view of the latest alarming conflict rocking the Persian Gulf is to fight to ensure an immediate end to the war. Once again the tragedy of the recourse to weapons involves newly independent countries belonging to the world that is laboriously seeking the path to autonomous development. None of the reasons given can justify the start or continuation of the conflict. Between Iraq and Iran, as between any other countries, there are no disputes than cannot be resolved through negotiations. None of the demands, or hopes, emerging from the conditions brought about by oppression and underdevelopment, to assert the values of freedom, progress and social justice in these countries can be realized outside the framework of peace, mutual cooperation and international detente. "World interests--economic, political and strategic--make the tragedy more serious and the consequences even more disastrous and, in an already very bad international situation, they accentuate the danger of the conflict spreading.

"Irresponsibility is displayed in the designs of those forces which are exerting pressure to exacerbate tensions and to bring about a recourse to weapons in order to stifle the Iranian revolution and nullify anti-imperialist and national ferments, and to prevent Iraq from following the original plans of that country's progressive forces. Italy, on account of its geographical position and its vital interests, is directly affected by the conflict and threatened by its possible spread within the zone to the Mediterranean itself. This requires that our country first avoid an interference and provision of military supplies and that it take initiatives, in all forums, aimed at urging the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of the conditions needed for a peaceful and negotiated solution to the unresolved problems between the countries.

"The objective of the defense of peace, detente and negotiation demands the intensification and development of the unitary and mass commitment. In particular, it is up to the forces of the Italian and European workers movement, the progressive and democratic forces, to realize the pressing need for them to act. The communists have a duty to be in the front line in this action, with all their unitary impetus."

PARTIES' SPOKESMEN COMMENT ON GOVERNMENT'S FALL

AU290856 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 29 Sep 80

[Excerpts] Rome, 29 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party (PCI) was ostensibly pleased today with the climactic weekend fulfillment of two of its most eagerly pursued goals--the downfall of the Rome government and the postponement of the Fiat dismissals.

As soon as the government announced its resignation, the Fiat auto giant stepped forth to say that it would not go through with plans to fire more than 14,000 before the end of the year. By its own admission, the Turin-based multinational said that it was "objectively untenable" to create "new and ulterior...social strains" during a government crisis.

PCI Secretary Enrico Berlinguer welcomed the weekend developments as marking "the defeat" of a policy that represented "a challenge" and "a split" with regard to the working class and the communists.

The twofold achievement, he said in a speech delivered in southern Catania Sunday, bore the mark of Communist Party policy and "will aid the cause of working class, leftist and democratic unity".

The partners to Cossiga's out-going coalition were not so euphoric about the situation. DC Secretary Flaminio Piccoli voiced sharp disapprobation for what he said was "a disgraceful use of the secret ballot" in the lower house.

"The situation is delicate and tough", Piccoli said in his immediate reaction to the government's resignation Saturday, "and references are superfluous in an international and domestic situation full of serious events and undelayable needs". Piccoli gave the government credit for stepping down when it did not technically have to, thereby avoiding "speculation and polemics", and praised the job it has done.

PRI Secretary Giovanni Spadolini complained that the economic crisis has been "infinitely aggravated" by the "irresponsible" move to spark a government crisis. Horrified by the parliamentary spectacle that brought the government down, Spadolini exclaimed: "We have never seen such irresponsibility in the history of the republic! Never before has a vote of confidence been canceled out by a sharp-shooters' ambush in the space of just a few minutes time! And never before had a government crisis been set in motion when domestic tensions and international dangers were at their height!"

PSI Leadership Spokesman Claudio Martelli, Party Secretary Bettino Craxi's closest aide, charged that the "dangerous and unpredictable" situation created by the crisis was caused by "the irresponsible calculations of people who want the nation to go through convulsions and conspiracies". Parliament's credibility and the majority principle have been dealt a severe blow, he added, and "a phase of institutional decadence has been speeded up".

The right of center Liberal (PLI) and Social Democratic (PSDI) Parties offered their services to settle the crisis with the formation of a five-party coalition that would join then together with the three members of the out-going government.

PSDI Secretary Petro Longo said that the situation required "a sense of [word indistinct] and responsibility from all democratic parties". His own party, he added, will make "a loyal contribution" to the quest for a solution "which could finally guarantee adequate stability and effective governability". Longo took the occasion to urge closer ties with the PSDI and the Socialist Party.

PLI Secretary Valerio Zanone stated the need to "make up for six months of useless divisions and legislative paralysis" and called for "a government based on a legislative policy". He indicated that the margin existed for "finding a convergency bewteen the parties whose prospects and policies are not incompatible" and declared his own party a candidate for the process.

LEBANESE DELEGATION ARRIVES IN ROME FOR TALKS

It is scheduled to have a private audience with Pope John Paul II during its stay in the Italian capital.

DEFENSE MINISTER COMMENTS ON ROME-MALTA 'AXIS'

LD291027 Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 21 Sep 80 p 6

[Unattributed interview with Italian Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio: "If, One Winter's Night, One of al-Qadhdhafi's Cruisers...."]

[Text] Question: Mr Minister, the government has recently created a kind of Rome-Malta axis whereby Italy will have to commit itself not only to reviving the island's economy but also to defending its neutrality. What does it mean?

Answer: I would not all it an axis. It is rather one segment of a geometric figure that has to be constructed with other emergent Mediterranean counties ranging from Tunisia to Libya to cool this sea's waters somewhat.

Question: We shall see whether the axis become a geometric figure. What is important is what military-type commitments will be undertaken with the recently signed agreement. For instance, if, one winter's night, one of al-Qadhdhafi's cruisers....

Answer: We of the Defense Ministry were not the protagonists in the negotiations. The foreign minister, who headed the negotiations, simply asked us whether we agreed to guarantee Malta's neutrality, and we said yes. But for the time being we are not examining any particular plans.

Question: Some time ago you announced that if another war exploded, Italy could only survive a month. This being the case, how is it possible to guarantee other people's neutrality in the event of it being threatened?

Answer: We could only last a month (the studies that have been carried out are clear about this) if exposed to a total and generalized attack. In the event of a limited and local emergency, Italy's defensive strength must be assessed with a different yardstick. Nevertheless, I would like to add that the Maltese agreement was made to reduce tension, not to increase it.

Question: The PCI says that the Rome-Malta axis was established to please the United States. What is your opinion?

Answer: Many people see the Americans everywhere. The fact is that recently the United States, and to an extent the USSR too, have shown they have little ability to control the more delicate situations. As far as I know--and I am referring to my first contacts with counterparts from NATO countries--I must say that the mutual exhortation is to take the problem of relations with neighboring countries more to heart and to guarantee tranquility. I can only deduce that our allies can only pass a positive verdict on the Maltese agreement.

GROMYKO, PEREZ LLORCA DISCUSS CSCE, GULF WAR AT UN

LD291011 Madrid ABC in Spanish 25 Sep 80 p 21

[Own correspondent dispatch: "Gromyko-Perez Llorca Meeting"]

[Text] United Nations--The CSCE conference and bilateral matters were the topics broached by the Spanish and Soviet foreign ministers during the 1-hour meeting which they held yesterday morning at the former's mission. "It was a very interesting exchange in which there was agreement on some points and not so much on others," as Perez Llorca described it on leaving, although he was evasive and did not specify which points were which. But he confirmed that the issue of Spain's possible entry into NATO was not broached, although his Soviet counterpart made a reference to it in his speech before the assembly, in saying that his country was in favor of the two defense blocs not being enlarged.

The issue of the Madrid conference predominated, with Gromyko reiterating his government's stance of highlighting security and disarmament issues and leaving the issue of human rights and exchanges of all kinds between the two halves of the continent on a secondary level. This is something which they resist on the grounds of "interference in internal affairs," but which the West is pressing, believing that the Helsinki agreements cover the two aspects--disarmament and the accessibility of East and West Europe. The Russians are seeking to start with a major statement in support of peace, leaving the promotion of such exchanges until later. That is the gist of the conference and what is being debated during its preliminary stage.

Gromyko and Perez Llorca could not fail to touch on the crisis which has broken out in the Persian Gulf. The Soviet minister reiterated his government's viewpoint that this is a long-standing crisis which should be kept within its local limits, allowing the two sides to resolve their difference without external interference.

SOVIET CSCE POSITION CLARIFIED ON DIVISION OF WORK

LD261458 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] The preparatory sessions of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE)--a report from the Madrid Palace of Congresses and Exhibitions:

A solution is finally emerging from the discussions taking place at the heart of the preparatory meeting of the CSCE. Since yesterday afternoon the Soviet position has become clearer, in the sense that it accepts that work be divided into two clear segments: The first referring to the past, that is, the study of the fulfillment of the points which came out of the Helsinki conference; and the second referring to the future, that is, the study of the proposals submitted at the principal meeting which is to begin on 11 November. For this reason it is possible that this afternoon's session wil tackle the establishment of an agenda.

This morning the delegation from Malta expressed the need to include the subject of security of the Mediterranean on the agenda, with study of the documents submitted by those countries bordering the Mediterranean which are not attending this conference--this corresponds to point 4 of the Spanish proposal. At the same time, the Maltese representative read a communique from the PLO in which it is proposed that the conference accepts the presence--on equal terms with the other states--of the non-participant Mediterranean countries, the same ones as at the February meeting in Valletta, that is, all except Egypt, Israel and Lebanon, with the inclusion, naturally, of the PLO. The other countries rejected this proposal; it was not even entered in the minutes.

DEFENSE MINISTER COMMENTS ON PROPOSED DEFENSE PLAN

[Ritzaus Bureau report: "Rejects 1-Year Defense Agreements"]

[Text] "The government is open to all possible suggestions on a defense settlement, and this means that we cannot deny that 1-year settlements are among the possibilities." Defense Minister Poul Soegaard made this statement after a meeting with the Social Democratic members of the Folketing Defense Committee yesterday. The meeting discussed a proposal for a new defense plan that has just been completed by the Defense Ministry. "The proposal sums up what Danish defenses for the period 1981-85 should consist of against the background of an unchanged defense budget," Poul Soegaard told Ritzaus Bureau.

The proposal will be given its final form tomorrow at a meeting of the government's Defense Committee, which apart from Poul Soegaard is comprised of the prime minister, the finance minister and the economic affairs minister. On 30 September the government's new move will be presented to the parties which traditionally take part in defense settlement negotiations. As well as the Social Democrats, these are the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party, the Radical Liberal Party, the Center Democrats and the Christian People's Party. Poul Soegaard denied that there had been any intention of reaching a 1-year defense agreement, as Radical Liberal Party Defense Spokesman Jens Bilgrav-Nielsen claimed at the party's national conference at the weekend. "What is being discussed is that we see one possibility as having a 4-year defense framework, in which each year is flexible. That is to say that the Folketing might one year decide to use a smaller sum than the one established in the framework and instead transfer the money to a year in which it wants to use more money," Poul Soegaard said.

ANALYST NOTES TACIT KEKKONEN APPROVAL OF STOCKPILING

LD291431 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 25 Sep 80 p 16

[Unattributed report: "Kekkonen Approves of Contingency Stockpiling"]

[Text] "I would be most inclined to interpret the Finnish president's reactions as veiled approval, rather than as negative and critical interference in our own debate on contingency stockpiling."

This is the appraisal made by a Norwegian expert on Finnish security policy, researcher Arne Olav Brundtland, of the statements on Norwegian security policy that President Kekkonen made recently. Kekkonen's praise of Norwegian base policy and his omission of concrete criticism of the contingency stockpiling issue can really be taken as unofficial Finnish approval of the fact that contingency stockpiling is compatible with Norwegian basing policy and the strengthening of the Scandinavian balance, Brundtland told HOEYRE PRESSEBYRAA. The researcher added: "The statement must be interpreted to mean that Finland is confident that Norway can adopt the necessary security policy measures without damaging Finland's security interests."

"If contingency stockpiling had represented as serious a provocation to the Soviet Union as some participants in the debate seem to assert, Kekkonen would have had to clearly dissociate himself from Norway's action of adopting such measures. Otherwise the Soviet Union would have been able to choose to subject Finland to pressure with a view to countermeasures, that is, it would have invited Finland to consultations under the terms of the friendship treaty and thus undermined the Finnish neutrality policy. Such is obviously not the case."

DEFENSE MINISTER FAVORS TROENDELAG AS STOCKPILING CENTER

[Unattributed report: "Contingency Stockpiling Gives Us a Reasonable Degree of Security"]

[Text] "We are facing military developments in our part of the world which we must take seriously. We must look the facts in the eye and seek those military solutions that give us a reasonable degree of security," Defense Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg said in a speech yesterday at the opening of the defense forces' college's 26th principal course. The defense minister used the opportunity to clear up a number of misunderstandings in the current debate on the stockpiling of heavy equipment for a reduced brigade of U.S. Marines.

Even though no one thinks that the Soviet troop buildup in the north is directed especially against Norway, we cannot overlook the effects that this buildup can also have on our security, the defense minister pointed out. The Soviet forces in the north could prevent reinforcements from reaching Norway in time, and such a situation increases the danger of Norway being attacked. As far as the equipment for a reduced U.S. brigade of around 10,000 men is concerned, Stoltenberg called attention to a number of military considerations which suggest Troendelag as the site for stockpiling:

First and foremost, the chances of the reinforcements being cut off would be considerably reduced, since the distance from the Soviet Union is over 1,000 km. We strengthen the defense of Troendelag and in doing so we enable the forces there to make a contribution to the defense of other parts of southern Norway and the Helgeland coast. The force could also contribute to strengthening communications between Southern and Northern Norway, by securing supply lines to the northern part of the country and transporting reinforcements to it.

The defense minister also mentioned a number of military drawbacks of contingency stockpiling in northern Norway for this force, first and foremost that this area is so near the Kola region that the safe arrival of troops to the area by plane is a much greater problem than for the Troendelag alternative. In addition there are the purely security policy considerations--the desire for detente and reassurance--which make Troendelag the best alternative in the government's view.

The arms whose stockpiling is being discussed make it clear, in Stoltenberg's opinion, that the force does not represent a threat to anyone. All the weapons are short-range--3 to 15 km--and are distinctly defensive. This is true of the TOW anti-tank missiles (3 km) and the 155-mm howitzers (15 km). Our own defense forces are equipped with identical weapons.

It is also assumed that Hawk anti-aircraft missiles will form part of the stockpiles. This is also a distinctly defensive weapon which is intended to be used to give badly needed protection for the airfields in Troendelag. Its range is around 40 km. Many are concerned that the artillery pieces that will be stockpiled are able to fire nuclear warheads. "This is correct, but this is also true of our own artillery which is of the same type--and the situation is therefore no different from what it is today," the defense minister pointed out.

SEARCH FOR FOREIGN SUBMARINE INTENSIFIES OFF STOCKHOLM

LD261240 Stockholm Domestic Service in Sweden 1030 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] The armed forces will now step up the search for the foreign submarine which is suspected to be remaining in Swedish waters among the islands off Stockholm. Besides the coast guard, helicopters and submarines of the navy are also to participate in the search. The general staff hopes that the intensified surveillance will clarify whether or not the foreign submarine is still in Swedish waters.

Continued Search

LD281316 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1130 GMT 28 Sep 80

[Text] The search for a foreign submarine in the Stockholm Archipelago continues. About 1700 yesterday a helicopter dropped a depth charge on what was supposed to be a submarine. But the defense staff reported today that no contact had been made with a submarine, as it only had been an old shipwreck. As no trace of the submarine has been found it is no longer certain that it really remains in Swedish waters.

Defense Minister's Warning

LD291306 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1130 GMT 29 Sep 80

[Excerpt] Minister of Defense Erik Kronmark today commented for the first time on the case of the unknown submarine in the Stockholm Archipelago. According to the defense minister, this is the most serious violation of Swedish territory in the post-war period. And if the submarine does not go away, stronger methods must be employed, he said. The defense staff and the Ministry of Defense have already decided to step up the so-called fire for effect in order to compel the submarine to surface. According to Erik Kronmark, the situation is extremely serious.

[Begin recording] [Kronmark] Oh yes, I have to say, as this has now continued for such a long time, that this is no longer an ordinary violation of Swedish territorial waters, but the nation in question must have a definite political purpose for provoking Swedish interests for so long. Violations of Swedish territorial waters are not news, but that it should happen in such a flagrant manner during such a long period of time in spite of the fact that we have employed countermeasures indicates that those concerned must have political interests. That is my opinion.

[Unidentified reporter] Could you specify this?

[Kronmark] They can be of several kinds. From our point of view this is an unprecendented provocation. I want to emphasize to the leadership of the state that has infiltrated a submarine into Swedish territorial waters, that it is assuming responsibility for anything serious that may happen to this submarine. So far we have not taken really strong measures. We do not like to use such methods in peacetime to put a submarine out of action, but we could have done it. I emphasize that if the submarine stays we will of course have to take strong measures to compel it to surface to be identified. The nation that has sent the submarine in to Swedish waters will also be following the Swedish mass media and can hear what I am saying now. If something happens the Swedish authorities are not responsible for injuries and death caused to people. [end recording]

THATCHER MEETS WITH MINISTERS IN IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT

LD291607 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 29 Sep 80 p 28

[James Wightman report: "Thatcher 'Yes' to Carter Oil Talks"]

[Text] The prime minister called four ministers to Chequers to brief her on the Iran-Iraq conflict and its implications for Britain's oil imports. Earlier Mrs Thatcher had accepted an invitation from President Carter for Britain and other Western allies to join a conference to discuss the safeguarding of oil supplies.

The President's letter, received on Saturday, has started speculation about an international naval "police action" to keep open the key Straits of Hormuz. British sources said last night that all that was being proposed and agreed at the moment was a discussion of the threat which the conflict has posed to Western oil supplies. The purpose of the proposed meeting, which would probably be at foreign minister level, was said last night to be to discuss how to achieve a ceasefire, and how to negotiate a settlement between Iran and Iraq.

Mr Pym, defence secretary, was among the ministers with whom Mrs Thatcher had two hours of discussions yesterday. The others were Mr Howell, energy secretary, Sir Ian Gilmour, deputy foreign secretary, and Mr Hurd, a junior Foreign Office minister. The meeting was the prime minister's first direct briefing on the Iran-Iraq fighting since she began a visit to Greece and Yugoslavia last Monday. She returned to London on Friday night. The government views the conflict with very serious concern, but, with the benefits of North Sea oil, the implications are potentially less disastrous for Britain than for many other countries. However, Britain needs some oil from the Middle East for mixing with the North Sea crude, and under international agreements, Britain might have to share some of its own output with allies should Middle East supplies fall by more than seven percent.

CALLAGHAN CALLS FOR UNITY AT LABOR PARTY CONFERENCE

[Nicholas Comfort dispatch: "Callaghan Plea for Conference Unity"]

[Excerpt] Blackpool--Mr Callaghan appeals today for a truce in the struggle between his supporters and the left over the future shape of the Labour Party, with the stated aim of uniting next week's Blackpool conference in an onslaught on the government's policies. His call, in an eve-of-conference interview with the Labour weekly, comes as members of the party's left wing-dominated National Executive meet in the Lancashire resort to start planning tactics for the conference. The Labour leader, who is due to attend today's session, says the constitutional issues on the conference agenda will not be decided on their merits if pressed to a vote at Blackpool and will not bring peace to the party. "My own view," he says, "is that conference would be wise to put away the issue for the present and let it be considered quietly over a period when we have settled ourselves. I passionately feel that we shall betray our supporters in the country and the unemployed unless we emerge from the conference, as I hope and believe we will, with the united intention to go forward together."

The issues to which Mr Callaghan refers include changes in the system for electing the party leader, the confirmation of the vesting of the election manifesto in the conference and National Executive, and the mandatory re-selection of MPS. These questions have produced a furious debate within the party since last year's election defeat, culminating in last year's stormy Brighton conference and the subsequent inability of the party's commission of inquiry to agree on what should be done. Soundings among NEC [National Executive Committee] left-wingers last night showed little support for a moratorium as sought by Mr Callaghan and a desire to get the whole thing over and done with. Then, Executive members suggested, the party would be ready to take on the Tories.

PAPANDREOU CHARGES FOREIGN INVOLVEMENT IN DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

AT271320 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 27 Sep 80 p 1

[Excerpt] In their effort to achieve the immediate and unconditional return of our country to NATO's military wing, which is now the cornerstone of the government's foreign policy, responsible government personalities have--according to authoritative reports--gone as far as to implicate a foreign power in the country's domestic situation by presenting the return to NATO as a dynamic "trump card" for dealing with PASOK in the coming election.

More specifically, as can be concluded from a London TIMES report from Athens, during the talks here with British Prime Minister Thatcher, leading government personalities stressed that it is necessary to bolster the government in its effort to return the country to NATO so that in this way the opposition may be deprived of every chance for success.

PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou who was informed of this London TIMES report, made the following statement: "I consider it truly unbelievable that the Greek Government seeks a return to NATO for the purpose of dealing with the opposition in our country during the next election. The government has a duty to supply immediate explanations on whether an appeal was made to foreign powers which would be tantamount to a request for open intervention in our domestic affairs."

In the meantime, the official as well as unofficial consultations, discussions and pleading from the Greek side for the country's immediate return to military NATO as well as for the signing of the new agreement on U.S. bases, continue and climax at a frenetic rate.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON ISSUES OF U.S., NATO RELATIONS

I KATHIMERINI Report

AT281545 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 28 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

[Report by I KATHIMERINI New York correspondent Nikos Simos]

[Excerpts] New York--In its efforts toward the speediest possible start of talks for signing the agreement on U.S. bases in our country, Washington draws the attention of the Greek Government to the critical situation in the broader Mediterranean area. According to the United States, this "does not permit any further delay in resolving the uncertainty of Greek-U.S. defensive cooperation." This U.S. observation, which apparently was reiterated during the meeting of Foreign Minister Mitsotakis with Muskie in New York, was incorporated in a memorandum of five basic points which was attached to the copy of the U.S. proposals on a Greek-U.S. agreement, which U.S. Ambassador McCloskey recently presented to Athens.

The U.S. memorandum attempts to stress and explain U.S. views on the need for complete separation of the question of bases from developments in Greece's return to NATO's military wing. This is being attempted because, apart from the fact that the U.S. side knows very well that under its pressure the Turks would accept the newly revised Rogers plan, yet it continues to maintain reservations over a possible Turkish reneging.

The five basic points of the memorandum in general refer to:

1--U.S. bases in Greece do not operate exclusive in the service of U.S. interests but they also serve broader Greek defense requirements.

2--U.S. bases when evaluated within the framework of Western defense gain an ever greater importance. (According to the U.S. administration this should be taken into consideration by Greece in its capacity as a Western country.)
3--In reference to the connection of this issue to developments in the NATO issue, it is argued in another part of the memorandum that the Greek return to NATO so far has been prevented by certain details of a technical nature within the framework of the defensive function of the alliance. There is no problem in reference to the essence of the matter--the mutual desire of both sides for Greece's return to the military wing of the alliance. Greece has expressed its desire to return and the United States has also repeatedly stressed the necessity for such a return. Consequently, there should be no interference in the development of Greek-U.S. defense cooperation from "issues of a national nature" which remain pending for other reasons.
4--The pending defense agreement can be settled to the mutual benefit of both sides by amending several points of the 1977 agreement which would also become the foundation for the new one. (Editor's note: The amendments hinted at by the U.S. side which would be mutually beneifical are aimed at a certain reorientation of the role of these bases.)
5--The situation in the Mediterranean area is very critical and this does not permit any further delay in settling the uncertainty over U.S. bases in Greece.

In conclusion, the memorandum recommends the start of basic negotiations as soon as possible. Although Mitsotakis, during his chat with press representatives, avoided any reference to the bases issue, it appears that he had discussed it in detail, after the final presentation of the Greek views, with U.S. Secretary of State Muskie during their New York meeting yesterday.

As was made clear in New York, the U.S. side considers the settlement of the Greek-NATO uncertainty to be extremely important. This position becomes obvious not only through the interconnection of the future of U.S. bases in Greece and our country's return to NATO but also from the following U.S. general policies:

1--Stabilization of the Balkan situation. American interest in this goal is also strengthened by the concern expressed to the United States by Balkan countries which are members of the Warsaw alliance.

2--Strengthening of the defense network system. It appears that the U.S. administration is under pressure from American public opinion, which changed after the Vietnam war, for broader cooperation with its allies so that the United States may avoid unilateral action. This appears to urge the Carter administration toward a settlement of differences which may exist with its allies or between the allies, in an effort to guarantee a "concensus" of all Western countries on joint action and policy.

Under this spirit, there are indications that the U.S. administration is now convinced that during the next 5 years, which will be extremely critical for detente, Greece and the EEC could play an important role in maintaining a joint Western orientation and a joint Western action.

KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA Article

AT281619 Athens KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 28 Sep 80

[Report by KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA New York correspondent Louis Dhanos]

[Excerpt] New York, 28 September--A time limit for the unconditional return of Greece to NATO's military wing by the end of the year was set to Mitsotakis by his U.S. counterpart Muskie. [paragraph continues]

In this way the stage setting it suddenly changed: The time limit remains the same but it is now aimed in a different direction. Instead of Greece waiting until the end of 1980 for its return to NATO so that it can proceed with negotiations on U.S. bases, the United States now demands that we " should change course" and return to NATO by 31 December, and afterwards discuss "in a friendly and allied way" with the Turks on "who will command this or that part of the Aegean."

U.S. Secretary of State Muskie told Mitsotakis: "You say you want to return to the military wing of NATO, that you understand the vast importance to the whole of the alliance inherent in the reconstitution of its southeastern flank, but you do absolutely nothing to meet the conciliatory spirit of Turkey."

He then proceeded to make a "wish" which concealed much: "We should be finishing with this case. I ask you to think of what you are going to do and to tell us about it by the end of the year."

According to U.S. sources U.S. Secretary of State Muskie was clear and emphatic on the return of Greece to NATO. In answer to the Greek positions which were presented by the Greek foreign minister, Muskie countered with the "realism" which permeates U.S. foreign policy every time that "the strategic interests" of the Free World are in jeopardy.

Mitsotakis argued that:

Without restoring the status which applied prior to 1974 on the operational control of the Aegean, there would be no meaning in our return to NATO.
Greece has proved its pro-Western orientation by submitting its request to return even though the reasons which dictated withdrawal from the military wing of NATO have not been eliminated; 40 percent of Cyprus continues to be under the occupation of Turkish troops. There are no further limits for withdrawal.

Muskie's arguments were the following:

Within the framework of an alliance there is no importance in who exercises operational control. What is important is that such control is exercised effectively. In any event, such control has absolutely no relation to sovereign rights.
At a time when the Iran-Iraq war threatens world peace and huge Western interests are in jeopardy in the Persian Gulf, it is unacceptable that the southeastern flank of NATO should be "made useless."

Then came the "think it over well and make up your minds quickly."

In the lobby of the "plaza" of the United Nations where he was surrounded by press representatives, Mitsotakis was obviously nervous. He described his talk as "interesting and sincere," assured all that he personally was "clear and emphatic," but he said not a single word about what Muskie had said.

In answer to a question whether the Rogers plan was discussed, he replied with a curt and short "no."

The failure of the Mitsotakis-Muskie talks also becomes apparent from the content of the interview granted by the Greek foreign minister to an American television network.

TO VIMA Report

AT281400 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 28 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[Report by TO VIMA New York correspondent St. Evstathiadhis on Mitsotakis' talks in New York]

[Excerpts] The icy atmosphere which prevailed during the New York meeting of Mitsotakis and Muskie forecasts a new deterioration of relations with the United States. The U.S. secretary of state kept "an equal distance" between Greece and Turkey, asking both countries for "understanding", and he limited himself to listening--in a very frigid way--to the immovable Greek objections and to the conditions for our return which the Turks present as their "new line."

Absolute reserve was, in the meantime, expressed in Athens yesterday in contrast to what was reported from Washington and Brussels about the fate of negotiations with NATO. Ankara's "new line," that is, that it accepts Greece's immediate return under the conditon that all Aegean arrangements dating prior to 1974 will be abrogated, has not yet been officially presented to Athens, but authoritative sources stressed that it is not likely the Greek side will accept such a proposal. In reference to the Mitsotakis-Muskie meeting, our New York correspondent, St. Evstathiadhis filed the following report:

New York, 27 September--During his meeting with Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis on Friday afternoon, U.S. Secretary of State Muskie stressed the need for the show of unity by the West and for unification of Atlantic alliance forces, and asked Greece to demonstrate "a spirit of conciliation and full understanding" in respect to its "demands" for its return to NATO's military wing. Even though challenged by Mitsotakis, however, Muskie personally avoided giving even the slightest promise of any U.S. intervention for the purpose of removing Turkish objections. His only argument was that Washington is not almighty, that its possibilities are limited and that, in any case, he had also made a similar recommendation for "understanding" to Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen with whom he had an earlier meeting.

The question of U.S. bases in Greece was not discussed though it arose indirectly during the talks between the two ministers--which were described by the State Department as a "routine discussion." The Mitsotakis-Muskie meeting, which lasted for about 40 minutes and which was attributed with special significance by the Greek side, was basically limited (as TO VIMA was informed by a U.S. diplomatic source) to a monologue by the Greek foreign minister more or less exclusively upon the question of Greece's return to NATO's military wing without Mitsotakis even being given the opportunity to deal with details. The Cyprus issue was not discussed.

Always according to the same U.S. source, the Greek minister particularly insisted upon the need for a coordinated allied action toward Ankara and, more specifically, upon "a serious attempt" by the United States to remove Turkish reservations on the question of Greece's return, and he even insisted that there is urgency for the solution of the issue because the Greek Government "cannot accept" endless discussions on this issue. According to the U.S. source, Mitsotakis did not stipulate either any time limits or the removal of U.S. bases if our return is not achieved, although "he indicated that he wanted to point out such an intention by the Greek Government."

A Greek diplomat who accompanied the Greek minister during his talk with Muskie later observed that Mitsotakis had given a "dramatic" tone to the question of the return and to the time limits which Greece has available for its solution, stressing to his U.S. colleague that "he spoke to him with absolute sincerity and with the sense of responsibility as the appropriate minister of a friendly and allied country."

According to all indications, Muskie did not exhibit any reaction and, at least as reported by U.S. sources, he was "generally reserved; avoiding any obligation" for a U.S. intervention in any direction for the purpose of speeding this return. It is perhaps interesting that, always according to this same U.S. source, the entire conversation between the two ministers was considered to be "a constructive exchange of views on questions of bipartite relations and of the alliance" and that it was described in summary in 22 lines of the minutes of the day kept by the Office of the U.S. Secretary of State.

The Greek foreign minister was accompanied by Ambassadors Theodhoropoulos, Tzounis, Fridhas, Katapodhis and Zekeris while Muskie was accompanied by Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs Best and State Department officials Dillery and (Guinn).

Mitsotakis also had the opportunity to present Greek views on the question of the return [to NATO] and on U.S. bases to the broader American public through an NBC television interview on Friday afternoon.

Answering questions, the Greek foreign minister said that "Greece does not want to stop U.S. facilities. These facilities, however, operate within the framework of NATO and, as a result, their continued operation is interrelated with Greece's position within NATO."

It is, however, interesting that the television interviewed introduced the Mitsotakis interview with the statement that "We have bad news about the future of U.S. bases in Greece."

Answering a question on what the government will do if the United States stops supplying Greece with arms if the U.S. bases are closed, Mitsotakis did not exclude such a possibility but observed that "such a decision would be a mistake. If the United States took such a decision, in other words, if it decided to stop supplying Greece with weapons, then Greece would be forced to guarantee other sources for the supply of its needed armaments."

In his interview, the Greek minister also denied that "threats" were made about U.S. bases and explained that "without full Greek participation in NATO there would be neither a legal nor a political basis for the existence of U.S. bases in Greece. Recent international developments make it urgent for Greece to know where it stands so that we may be able to organize our own security in a way which best serves our own interests," he said.

I AVYI Article

AT281734 Athens I AVYI in Greek 28 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Report by the I AVYI New York correspondent Sofianos Khristodhoulou on the Mitsotakis-Muskie meeting]

[Excerpts] New York, Saturday morning--"Greece must very seriously consider the consequences of a possible decision to close the U.S. bases since such an action would jeopardize its own security." This "warning" is now being issued at different times and at different levels by senior State Department officials in an obvious attempt to intimidate the Greek side and to separate the question of bases from the question of our return to military NATO.

According to these officials if the Greek Government proceeds to the closing of the bases, then the United States will immediately stop "the supply of U.S. weapons to Greece" while by contrast it will continue and will increase the flow of U.S. war materiel to Turkey with all its unavoidable effects upon the balance of power in the Aegean. Consequently, instead of the Greek side "making threats against the Americans" it would be better if it reconsidered the entire issue.

This line of thinking can be discerned in the questions presented by NBC (one of the largest U.S. television networks) yesterday to Foreign Minister Mitsotakis during an exclusive interview.

"We have bad news about our bases in Greece," said the television interviewer just before presenting his questions to Mitsotakis, questions which, it was reported, "were prepared with the assistance of the State Department."

Some of these questions were: Why does Greece want to close U.S. bases? What will Greece do if the United States stops the supply of U.S. weapons?

The Muskie-Mitsotakis Meeting

At the moment this report is being written (6 am New York time) there are no specific facts about yesterday's Muskie-Mitsotakis meeting.

The U.S. secretary of state avoided meeting the press (he hastily departed from the "Pier" Hotel where the meeting took place directly for Washington) while Mitsotakis himself did not appear particularly pleased with his talks with his U.S. counterpart.

"I repeated the Greek views to Muskie," he said, "with clarity, emphasis and sincerity." He avoided, however, any mention of how Muskie received the Greek positions this time. Mitsotakis he can make no forecasts on whether there will be "any progress on the issue of NATO" and that the had nothing to say about the Muskie-Erkmen meeting which took place earlier. "Ask them yourselves if you want to know," he said.

According to an ATHENS NEWS AGENCY dispatch, Mitsotakis told U.S. television that "it would be a mistake for the United States to stop arms shipments to Greece if the bases were closed."

He then stressed: "In such an eventuality Greece would be forced to seek other sources of military equipment.

During the same interview which was given in the NBC studio (Channel 4) Mitsotakis reiterated that the continued operation of U.S. bases in Greece is interrelated to our country's position within NATO and he stressed that latest international developments dictate a speedy clearing up of the situation so that Greece may know where it stands and so that it can take care of its own security in the best possible way.

OFFICIAL GAZETTE PUBLISHES NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL 'CODE'

LD281330 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1130 GMT 28 Sep 80

The Council of Ministers or a specific Cabinet member can be unseated by a simple majority of the National Security Council.

It is up to the Council to order legal proceedings against a (?Cabinet) member.

TA291643 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 29 Sep 80

According to a statement by the Finance Ministry, $92 million was deposited in the Turkish Central Bank in accordance with the standby agreement which went into effect on 18 June 1980.

The standby agreement between Turkey and the IMF envisages granting a $1.65 billion loan to Turkey over a period of 3 years. Turkey received the first part of the loan--$250 million--in July.

FOREIGN MINISTER TURKMEN GIVES VIEWS ON CURRENT ISSUES

NC291335 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 26 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] In an exclusive statement to MILLIYET prior to his departure for New York, where he will participate in the UN General Assembly session, Foreign Minister Turkmen said that "Greece, to ease its reintegration into NATO's military flank, seems inclined to agree to a formula that envisages that no command control areas should be determined in the Aegean and that this should be done subsequently through bilateral talks." Turkmen added: "However, we are not in a position to make a definite statement on Greece's latest attitude because negotiations are being conducted at NATO military headquarters. On the other hand, the settlement of this question will eliminate a problem that adversely affects our relations with Greece."

Replying to the question "Do you share the views of certain circles that following the military takeover by the Turkish commanders, Turkey would pursue a more flexible and concessive policy on NATO, Greece and military relations with the United States?" Turkmen said: "This conviction is totally wrong. It would be a flagrant contradiction to expect an administration composed of soldiers to be less sensitive than civilians to such matters as establishing command control areas in the Aegean. Even the thought of it is absurd. I believe that these speculations arise from not understanding the difference between determined action and the desire to exhaust all possibilities for talks. The general conditions for negotiations with the Greeks have not changed; at the very least, a better atmosphere has probably been created.

Therefore, it is not easy to say in which areas improvements are expected before the talks start. What matters is that both sides should be willing to make headway. There are obviously certain complicated issues. It is impossible for us to resolve such a complicated issue as the continental shelf in one session. We are participating in these talks in a most constructive spirit, free from any fantasy that may prove detrimental later."

Replying to our questions regarding developments on this subject, Turkmen said: "We are not familiar with any details since the negotiations are being conducted at the NATO headquarters. Turkey is in favor of Greece's reintegration into NATO's military flank, but it is unthinkable that this can be realized at the expense of Turkey's interests and views. Honorable Erkmen provided a sensible definition of the fundamental principles on which a conciliation can be reached: Greece should return to NATO, aware that no command control areas have been determined in the Aegean Sea. That is, it must be admitted that the question of fixing command control areas will remain in abeyance and that this issue will be discussed later in order to develop command control areas acceptable to both sides. There are certain indications that Greece is inclined to agree to this, but we are not in a position to make a definite statement today in this respect. Instead of advancing new demands, it is important that Greece should show the understanding I have outlined and that it should adopt that as a starting point."

On the Cypriot question, the foreign minister stated that no direct negotiations had been taking place between Turkey and Greece and added that both countries were willing to help the two communities on the island prolong the period of negotiations. The foreign minister further said: "There is agreement between both communities on the main principles of a settlement. The issue is not simple. Negotiations are extremely complicated. It is not easy to secure a rapprochement between the approaches of both sides. However, these should not be considered to be obstacles in the way of energetic negotiations. We believe that the Turkish Cypriot community will adopt a very constructive stand so as to lead the negotiations to succes This is the impression I formed during my recent visit to Cyprus."

Referring to the conflict between Iraq and Iran, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said: "From the point of view of protecting the peace and stability in our region and in the world, this conflict is causing anxiety. It is extremely difficult to make a healthy assessment of the probable outcome of this conflict. Speculations do not take us anywhere."

As to the kind of initiatives the Soviet Union may venture in this region when the conflict is over Turkmen said: "It is difficult to diagnose the USSR's attitude. At the moment, it is maintaining a very cautious and dignified attitude. As a matter of fact, the latent strength of both sides is not favorable for a protracted conflict. With regard to making certain suggestions and proposals to the two friendly and neighborly countries, we have expressed our anxiety over the developments. If we are to make any approach, we have first to find out very carefully how both sides will evaluate our efforts and whether we can be of any help to them."

Replying to a question as to whether the military administration would ratify the Turkish-U.S. defense and cooperation agreement, Turkmen said: "The administrations and legislatures of Turkey and the United States were supporting this agreement. It did not go through the Turkish Grand National Assembly because of the various arguments and discussions dominating the parliament at the time. This matter has not yet been tackled by the new administration, but it will undoubtedly be taken up and ratified. This issue has not posed any problem in either the past or the present."

We asked Turkmen how Turkey was planning to participate in the holy war against Israel declared at the recent Islamic conference in Morocco, including the resolution at this conference to oust Israel from the United Nations. We also asked him whether it was possible to sever relations with Israel completely. He said: "Before Turkey decides what action to take in this matter, let us see what happens at the United Nations. Such a resolution has to be approved by the Security Council. We all know that some members of the Security Council have the right to veto such a resolution. Therefore, it is no use expressing an opinion on a matter that is not even on the agenda. As a matter of fact, the Islamic countries have been trying to hinder Israel from participating in the work of the UN General Assembly. The way to go about this is to see that the credentials of the Israeli delegates are not recognized. The Islamic countries concerned will have to have certain consultations on implementing this. Turkey has quite clearly stated its position on Jerusalem. We shall watch very carefully the extent to which Israel will comply with the UN resolutions."

DEFENSE MINISTER COMMENTS ON IRAN-IRAQ CLASHES

TA261417 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Text] National Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken made the following statement to journalists today regarding the war between Iran and Iraq: Turkey regrets the fact that Iran and Iraq, which are two friendly and neighboring countries, are engaged in war. It is our greatest wish that these two brotherly countries solve the problems existing between them through peaceful means and that they reach a cease-fire agreement as soon as possible to achieve that end. Turkey is closely following this war which is taking place very close to its borders. The Turkish Armed Forces, as always, are prepared to implement their existing plans. Our goal is to secure the integrity of our country and nation. All necessary measures have been taken in this direction.

STATEMENT ISSUED ON IRAQ-IRAN CONFLICT

LD291229 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] The nine EEC governments issued the following statement on Wednesday, 24 September:

"1. The nine EEC states express their grave concern at the military confrontation between Iraq and Iran.

"2. Noting the bilateral nature of the conflict they stress the need to avoid anything which could give it a broader dimension. In this respect they hope that the restraint shown by other states, notably by the superpowers, will be maintained.

"3. They approve of the appeal launched by the Islamic Conference secretary general for an immediate cease-fire and, with reference to the consultations opened by UN Secretary General Waldheim, state that they are prepared to support any international initiative conducive to the political settlement of the dispute.

"4. They recall the crucial importance for the entire international community of freedom of navigation in the Gulf, which it is imperative to maintain.

"5. They have decided to continue to follow developments in the situation with the closest attention and are ready to contribute to the search for a solution."

LUNS ON EASTERN CRITICISMS OF USSR OVER AFGHANISTAN

LD192010 Hamburg DPA in German 1701 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] Essen, 19 Sep (DPA)--NATO does not see any sign whatsoever that the USSR is trying to find a way out of Afghanistan. This was stated by NATO Secretary General Luns in a lecture in Essen today. However, the tough reaction of the West to the incursion into Afghanistan had restricted the elbowroom of the USSR. One of the most important questions of the future would be, Luns said, "how effective pressure on the USSR would be." This applies not only to the measures of the NATO states but to the international community of states as well. Soviet interference in Afghanistan is meeting with mounting criticism inside the Eastern bloc. "We possess information from high-ranking sources throughout Eastern Europe that even statesmen who believe that they must pay lip service to the USSR and support it, in private conversation regard Afghanistan as a big mistake," Luns said.

KREISKY DISCUSSES DETENTE, TIES WITH FRANCE, POLAND

LD301007 Paris LE FIGARO in French 25 Sep 80 p 3

[Marianne Lohse interview with Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky: "France Has Opportunities in Austria"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Text] Question: Chancellor, you have have often bemoaned the "lack of French interest in Austria" (to use your own words). How do you see the development of relations between the two countries now that Mr Barre is visiting Austria?

Answer: I must admit that Georges Pompidou did a great deal with regard to Austrian relations with the Community. At that time Paris realized that because of our neutrality and since we could not joint the EEC, we should obtain a special arrangement. The solution defined for us and for other "outsiders" such as Switzerland and Sweden is very realistic. However economic cooperation between our two countries is not as intensive as it could be. We have obtained important results (Renault and the chemical industry). France has other opportunities in Austria. That is what we want to discuss with Mr Barre.

Question: There is a great deal of talk about the possibility of Austria acquiring military aircraft (Mirage aircraft if the French proposal were accepted).

Answer: This is primarily a financial question. Can the state budget finance such a transaction in a general economic situation of recession? The second question is which aircraft? We are busy examining the various proposals put forward by the two main French and U.S. (F-16 aircraft) competitors. We are also studying the question of compensation and so forth.

Question: Poland is a country with which you have close relations. How do you view the recent events in Poland?

Answer: In my opinion there is an essential conflict between a free trade union and a communist dictatorship. However there may be a real chance of developing this new experiment in Poland, after all Poland has found special rules and a special practice for coexistence between state and church. If the state were to disregard (or destroy) the achievements attained in the negotiations between Gierek and the strikers it would be a disaster, not only for the Polish working class but for the communist parties in Europe. It would show all workers in democratic countries that the dictatorship of the proletariat is a dictatorship "over" the proletariat. I cannot believe that Moscow wants that.

Question: If the Soviets were to take a tougher attitude now, after Afghanistan and Poland, what meaning do you think the word "detente" could have?

Answer: The Soviet behavior in these two cases is very different. In Afghanistan the Soviet Union demonstrated its strength and harshness by military invasion. That is a very risky adventure: I do not think a war has ever been won against partisans since the days of Napoleon in Spain. In Poland, Moscow has so far adopted a very patient attitude. I am convinced that that is motivated by Helsinki. Brutal action would have destroyed the Helsinki agreements completely! When discussing the detente policy we must not look only at Afghanistan but at Poland also. I do not mean that one makes up for the other. However we must see the difference. Detente is based on a balance of mistrust and the scales are constantly moving. Had it not been for the Afghan intervention SALT III could have been negotiated after ratification of SALT II. The Soviet show of strength dramatized the situation.... However, we must not forget that the superpowers have usually managed to settle conflicts in the framework of detente which is not peace. They have not always done so in a very nice way (look at the partition of Germany). There is a danger that they might one day negotiate a big "deal" in this crucial region of the Near East.

DER SPIEGEL QUESTIONS SCHMIDT, STRAUSS ON QUALIFICATIONS

DW301159 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 29 Sep 80 pp 24-60

[Excerpts] Question: What do you think enables you to be a better chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany in 1980 than your competitor?

Schmidt: Your question is an invitation to indulge in self-praise. I do not like that. Still, I am grateful because many citizens attribute discipline and circumspection in my mode of thinking and action, and I would like to claim both, without any false modesty. Ever since I had to take political responsibility I have been profoundly convinced that only he who is prepared to compromise is suited for democracy, who will indeed advocate expressly his national interests while seeking to balance them honestly with the other interests. I also believe that I am immune to the temptation of overrating our German options. I agree that many of our compatriots deem me capable of pragmatic judgment, a sense of perspective and a sense of the realities of German and international politics.

Strauss: The clear, credible, realistic objectives of our program, the internal cohesion of the Union, and our better team. In the past legislative period Helmut Schmidt was no longer able to rely on a safe majority in either his left-drifting party or in the coalition whenever vital questions of the nation were at stake. In view of the strengthening of the extreme leftwing in the SPD, Schmidt is probably much less capable than before of governing against the will of the leftwingers--with all the dangerous consequences for our internal and external security, for our energy and raw material supplies and for the future of our market economy.

Question: Which of your characteristic features do you consider particularly suited for political crisis management?

Schmidt: I need not deny what critical contemporaries have said about me. I can stay calm in critical phases of politics even if developments--such as after the kidnapping of Hanns-Martin Schleyer and later after the hijacking of the Lufthansa plane--deeply affects me inwardly. I am not inclined to make either rash or unilateral decisions. But I do believe that I have shown that after thorough consideration and consultation with people whose judgment I trust, I do not procrastinate necessary decisions. Each decision, and this is something that I think goes without saying, is preceded by a conscientious analysis of the causes of a crisis in which I seek to include all factors, political and human. Then I do urge a clear decision. In doing so I am perfectly aware of the risk of making a faulty decision. If you allow me to quote Max Weber, I adhere to the ethics of responsibility.

Strauss: My knowledge of history and geography, my gift of analytically putting two and two together, my realistic relationship with modern technology, my political sense, my conscience, my ability to think quickly and decide in good time.

Question: What historical-political models do you follow when you consider the difficult times we are facing?

Schmidt: You probably know how negatively I think of Bismarck and his domestic policy, not merely because of the laws involving the socialists. As a foreign policy practitioner his principle in the seventies and eighties was--to put it roughly--that one could represent the interests of one's own state best if one tries to put oneself in one's oponent's place. This still hold true today, since we must deal with dangerous situations in many parts of the world. Briand and Stresemann acted and thought in the same way--they are good examples with regard to foreign policy. As regards domestic policy, I particularly have in mind the fathers of the American Constitution, the founders of the United States, President Abraham Lincoln and Federal President Gustav Heinemann.

Strauss: To those who are currently politically active, historical models will always be merely some sort of preliminary directives because every new age brings new tasks and demands, new decisions. History does not know regularity as Marx and his disciples claim, and historical moments do not recur, so that following a historical-political model may easily make those who were born later fail the reality of their time if they apply retrospective stubbornness. In the field of epistemology it is bad enough, in the field of science it is at least correctable. In the political field, however, action based on models can lead under certain circumstances to grave errors. On the other hand, no politician should act on the spur of the moment. Those considering the past a "book with seven seals," an impenetrable jungle, will not find a position from which they can maintain their attitude, without which one cannot take over political responsibility.

The personal model of really great persons of the past remains untouched by daily events. It deals with how humans behave. For example, the wisdom and humanity of Pericles, the loyalty of Charles V, the active compassion of Henri Dunant, the adamant attitude of Father Rupert Mayer, the mildness and erudition of King Maximilian II of Bavaria--and many more could be named whose human greatness could set standards for politicians of today and tomorrow. Those bearing responsibility today would be well advised to remember whose action has promoted freedom and humanity.

Question: In making your decisions on political or economic issues do you listen to personal friends, too, apart from your advisers? And if so, to whom?

Schmidt: The advice of reliable friends has always been important to me. I have asked for such advice often enough, without dragging these people into responsibilities which I had to bear myself. To me it has always been important to assess my own judgment critically by that of such friends who have accomplished special feats in their particular fields. In this connection I gratefully think of such older friends as Fritz Erler, Carlo Schmid, Adolf Arndt, or Wilhelm Kaisen. But the judgment of personages outside my own circle of friends is always important to me, and I may cite as an example the German Jesuit father, Professor von Nell-Breuning, and the English philosopher Karl Popper.

Important decisions must not be based exclusively on the advice of official colleagues and advisers or on the advice of friends. One must obtain expert knowledge and power of judgment from all attainable directions.

Strauss: A politician profoundly rooted in democracy just does not make decisions all alone. I gladly listen to the proposals, ideas and also critical views of my aides and friends, digest them, and include them in my decisions and speeches. With the members of my family I discuss not only problems of daily life but also the events of world politics and German policies. Often I exchange political views with good friends, listening to them and forming my own opinion about them, friends who surely have exerted influence on my political actions now and then, whenever I deemed their ideas appropriate after thorough examination. The political dialogue with them is very valuable to me, especially since the circle of my friends is not restricted to politicians but encompasses people from many walks of life, from entirely different spheres of experience, and also from the younger generation.

Question: What is your annual income? What will be your anticipated retirement annuities, and what do you estimate your assets to be?

Schmidt: According to my last income tax statement my taxable annual income in 1978 came to DM233,000, with DM121,000 left after income and church taxes. So far I have not given any thought to my retirement benefits. They are stipulated in the law on members of parliament and in the law on ministers. According to the last property tax schedule, in 1978 my wife and I owned a house in Hamburg with unit value of DM196,000 (the house has a mortgage of DM49,000) and a vacation home on Brahmsee with a unit value of DM41,000. We also have federal bonds worth roughly DM98,000. Life insurance in 1978 came to DM21,000.

Strauss: Every citizen is free to find out my salary as minister-president of Bavaria, my remuneration as a member of the Bavarian land diet and possible future retirement annuities on that basis from the pertinent Bavarian legislation. Besides, I go by what Friendship Nietzsche said: Some people do not know how rich they are until they learn which rich people turn thief against them. I have asked the publisher of DER SPIEGEL, Mr Rudolf Augstein, several times to state how much he makes from DER SPIEGEL and what his assets from the journal are, but I never got an answer.

Question: Do you think it is inevitable for a politician not to tell the truth at some time in the course of his career? If so, when did this happen in your case, and what did you feel at the time?

Schmidt: A politician may be compelled not to broach certain facts publicly immediately for reasons of state or because the decision-making process so warrants, but should he intentionally tell a lie he will shake his credibility.

In 1976 I misjudged the situation on pension insurance. For this reason the opposition in this election campaign, years later, called me a "political pension swindler." At the time I made my statements in the conviction that the facts justified my utterances. Addressing the Bundestag with a government statement on 16 December 1976 I admitted without glossing over it that we had made a mistake. This economic misjudgment was very painful to me, and I have not pushed it out of my mind since.

Strauss: In political debate, too, I avow the commandment that "thou shalt not lie" and "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." This is why I usually speak my mind and act accordingly. Because of my deeply rooted responsibility toward our citizens, I am against talking differently before the elections than afterward. As a politician you experience truly cynical examples of this. When my friends and I during the election campaign in 1969 contended that an APD-led Federal Government would recognize the GDR, contrary to 20 years of common platform policy on Germany, I met with a vehement reaction. It climaxed in our contention being called an election campaign lie. But directly after taking over the government the SPD did exactly the opposite of what it had earlier promulgated as the solid component of its policy, that is, what it had earlier termed slander. Mr Bahr, replying to our charge that they had talked differently about the GDR prior to the elections, in the Bundestag on 24 January 1974 replied with matchless cynicism that earlier the majorities had not been such as to allow telling the truth. Just recently I stressed that it is necessary in the Federal Republic to get back to a situation where words and the truth can at least be seen in one field of vision without anyone having to turn their head 180 degrees.

Question: The impression prevails among the public that disagreement exists between yourself and portions of the party supporting you, the SPD and the CSU, respectively. How do you explain that?

Schmidt: It is a strange interpretation of a democratic party that its members must back their elected leaders as a unit, like a Prussian cadet school. When I recall how many endurance tests the Union parties weathered only with extreme difficulty because of Franz Josef Strauss, when I think of all that Messrs Kohl and Albrecht semipublicity said about the CSU chairman and of what he himself said about the aforementioned two, then I can only smile over the Strauss slogan that I am a captive of the left wing of my party.

True, I sometimes did have harsh objective debates with fellow party members: for example, with Erhard Eppler over the nuclear energy issue or with other Social Democrats over the military balance, which I consider imperative. Many times the arguing with these--mostly younger--Social Democrats was toilsome and occasionally tasked my patience considerably. Yet such debates have been part of the character of the SPD for the past 118 years. After all, it is not dishonorable to struggle for majorities in one's own party and to compromise occasionally as well: this has not been my political line in any way.

A federal chancellor, and much less a chancellor of a coalition government, simply cannot see himself as the executive organ of party decisions. Nor have I ever felt like the captive of my party--and this will hold true also for the future. But I am just one among a million Social Democratic Party members. I trust in all of them--and vice versa, all of them trust the chancellor.

Strauss: The election campaign has proved the opposite for the CDU/CSU. The Union backs its chancellor candidate in cohesion. He stands for the Union's joint program for political change in Germany. Unlike the dissension in the political camp of the Social Democrats in which the leftwing up to the Stamokapists [advocates of state monopoly capitalism] of the Jusos [young Socialists, youth organization of the SPD] increasingly calls the shots, there are no differences in the Union on all essential political questions.

Question: Do the German people have any reason to be afraid of the future?

Schmidt? No! Our compatriots know without having to be told by the chancellor that we will not be able to live in such a cozy world in the future. But there is no need to be afraid. With the great powers beginning to talk with each other again, to which development Mr Genscher and I contributed quite a bit, it may be possible to neutralize the effects of the different hotbeds of conflict in the world on Europe and to eliminate the causes of such conflicts through patient negotiations. I will be helping actively in this respect in the future as well.

There is no call for anxiety in the fields of domestic, economic, financial and social policies. Notwithstanding all the problems we are facing as a consequence of world economic developments, Germany is in far better shape than most states of the world.

Strauss: Fear is always a poor adviser. I refuse to capitalize politically, as Helmut Schmidt does, on the people's fear of a new war, a fear artificially produced in advance. But there is cause to worry indeed in view of the menacing preponderance of the Warsaw Pact over NATO; in view of our insecure energy and raw material supply; in view of the immensely increased and rapidly growing state indebtedness; in view of the international competition that has become more vehement; but also in view of the threat to internal security, the population development, the unsolved problem of asylum seekers, the educational misery of the youth--I will only mention the numerous clausus restriction on university enrollment--and last but not least the problem of drug abuse that has not yet been contained.

Question: In Ostpolitik and in detente policy both of you feel committed to the principle of "pacta sunt servanda," one being convinced of the correctness of the treaties with the East, the other for reasons of compulsory loyalty to treaties. How do you propose in the future to enhance relations with the East in keeping with this principle?

Schmidt: We abide by the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of other states, also because we do not wish others to intrude in our own affairs. This does not mean at all that we are indifferent toward efforts for democratic freedom and human rights, no matter where other peoples seek to gain more freedom. On the bases of the treaties we have concluded we intend to develop a relationship of good neighborliness with the governments and peoples of the communist states, regardless of fundamental differences. The German under Hitler violated treaties. We must not let anybody harbor any doubt about our observance of treaties.

But it will not suffice to abide by the treaties concluded only technically so far. They must be constantly imbued with life and impelemented. Good neighborliness requires continous efforts! The opposition knows of no alternative to the policy of getting along or to the treaties.

Strauss: We consider the treaties with the East wrongly conceived, miserably negotiated, poorly phrased, and therefore lending themselves to controversial interpretation. But we have to take them as they are. I was the first Union politician to state in the Bundestag in January 1973 that these treaties are binding. I would like to add by way of supplement that we will not only abide by these treaties, but we will also apply these treaties. We will endeavor to make the best of these poor treaties for the benefit of the people. However, the rulings of the federal constitutional court of 1973 and 1975 on the interpretation of these treaties are valid. They have put up for the planned continuation of Ostpolitik the same barriers which also became plain for the failure of "detente policy." German Ostpolitik did not start as late as 1969. It was 25 years ago the other day that negotiations were opened in Moscow between Chancellor Konrad Adenauer and Premier Bulganin which ended up in the release of the German prisoners of war and the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Soviet Union. German Ostpolitik will also be pursued on the basis of an equal give and take after the CDU and CSU take charge of the government, but it will be pursued soberly, free of illusions, vigilantly, on the basis of historical knowledge and political experience.

Question: The relationship between the United States and the Federal Republic is considered troubled. What steps do you think need to be taken after 4 November vis-a-vis the new U.S. president?

Schmidt: Our relationship is all right. It does not require any special "steps." When the Union candidate announces that he, once chancellor, will first take a trip to Washington and not to Warsaw or to East Berlin, this is but poorly self-evident. You will recall that Mr Strauss was an ardent Gaullist for years who wished to put some distance between himself and the United States.

Occasional differences of opinion between us and the U.S. Government are part of the normal situation even between friends who trust each other. The Americans need reliable but also critical German partners who speak their mind frankly and who will not shrink back from advocating the national interests of the Germans. The bases of U.S.-German friendship are so profound that they cannot be harmed by occasionally divergent assessments.

My own next trip to the United States after the U.S. elections was scheduled long ago.

Strauss: The relations between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany are not so bad as the communists would like them to be, to be sure, yet neither are they as good as they should and could be. The doubts of the United States about the future foreign policy course of the SPD are solidifying, and they are watching with growing concern the emergence of anti-American sentiments in the Federal Republic of Germany. This development is understandable. A large segment of our Social Democrats, above all the young generation, but not only the latter, have never internally accepted and politically understood two democratic decisions dating back to the government term of the CDU and the CSU: the decision for a social market economy and the decision on the accession to the Atlantic alliance. Today Helmut Schmidt represents the Bundeswehr and the NATO membership as an essential pillar of "his" security policy. Yet the Bundeswehr and the membership in NATO had to be enforced by the CDU and CSU against the harsh resistance of the Social Democrats. In both votes in the Bundestag there is the notation, no, behind the name of Helmut Schmidt.

Today Helmut Schmidt keeps silent about the attempts of the segment of the SPD Bundestag group which the U.S. press terms the "Moscow faction," of the young Socialists and the miscellaneous auxiliary troops of the SPD which produce a hostile climate against the most important protective power of the Atlantic alliance. A course is being set if the Americans are supposed to be identified with warmongers while Moscow is promoted as the new guarantor of peace. This does not involve youthful foolishness but the purposeful attempt to cause a breakdown, because otherwise the shock of Afghanistan should have been enough to put an end to this irresponsible activity.

If we separate from the United States, a development which Helmut Schmidt is beginning to prepare psychologically, and if we ultimately resign from NATO, which some prominent SPD politicians propagandize, if we withdraw from the EC, which many members of the Socialist International pursue, then we will deliver ourselves up to Moscow's mercy. Then it will be a mere matter of time until all of Europe will be communist. But if we instead consolidate the Western alliance with its superior economic potential and its attractive freedom, Moscow cannot but take seriously each individual partner, not least the Federal Republic of Germany.

This is why my first official trip after the CDU and the CSU take charge of the government will take me to the United States. The relationship of trust must again be made as close as it always was under Konrad Adenauer. We will strengthen the Atlantic alliance through our contribution. It is only from this solid groundwork that we can pursue an Ostpolitik which will guarantee peace and freedom.

Question: What chances do you give the new disarmament talks proposed by Brezhnev?

Schmidt: The forthcoming dialogue between Secretary of State Muskie and Foreign Minister Gromyko serves the purpose of bringing about negotiations first of all in the field of the Soviet medium-range missiles which are threatening us, negotiations which at best will greatly reduce nuclear armament in Europe--in balance, to be exact. We Germans have a vital interest in this dialogue. This is why I insisted on it--above all in Moscow. In the future, too, we will keep urging and admonishing so that an arms race will be prevented on the basis of military balance.

Strauss: Just because Helmut Schmidt wanted to return as a peace lord rather than empty-handed from his journey during the election campaign, which was wrongly timed and dubious as to its previous history, he was prepared to smuggle into NATO's nest like a cuckoo's egg the allegedly new Soviet proposal concerning disarmament talks in the field of medium-range missiles. Moscow's proposal which Schmidt brought along from Moscow in his luggage envisages bilateral talks by the United States and the Soviet Union on the two great powers' nuclear medium-range missiles including the so-called forward based systems, meaning the forward stationed defense weapons of the United States even with a short range. This terminology, however, is the English translation of a Soviet term by which the Kremlin intends to put the Americans under psychological pressure. So far neither the United States nor NATO has accepted this terminology. The hitch to Moscow's proposal can be easily spotted. All offers Moscow has made so far contained preconditions to be fulfilled by the West Europeans: the suspension of the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap in one case, and the inclusion of the French and British nuclear weapons in SALT III in another.

Now the Soviet Union has used Helmut Schmidt as the messenger for an offer which is linked with a precondition that can only be fulfilled by the U.S. Congress: the ratification of the SALT II treaty. The thrust of this Soviet strategy is clear. Moscow expects the European NATO partners to bring political pressure to bear on the United States in an unholy alliance with the Soviet Union so as to make the United States ratify the SALT II treaty, which would be bound to lead to a serious burdening of the ailing U.S.-European relationship or to a situation where the Europeans refuse to implement the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap on the grounds that the United States, by its nonratification, torpedoed the disarmament negotiations offered by the Soviet Union and which promised success. What Moscow wants to achieve by its continued rejection of purposeful negotiations on disarmament in the field of medium-range missiles and its wishy-washy offer is to drown the real topic in a general missile palaver. Brezhnev's prodding of Carter with reference to the proposal conveyed by Schmidt shows exactly what game is to be played here so as to prevent genuine disarmament and to camouflage accelerated armament by the Soviet Union and induce the Europeans to repudiate the decision on closing the arms gap.

Question: Considering the instability of detente in Europe, do you deem it necessary to intensify talks with the People's Republic of China, or is reserve indicated with respect to such attempts at an approach?

Schmidt: In the interest of safeguarding peace it would be dangerous to try and play one communist great power against the other. We have developed normal diplomatic and economic relations with the People's Republic of China without allowing others to tell us what to do. But I do not think much of brandishing a so-called "Chinese card."

Strauss: Realistic detente policy has three preconditions: 1) It must not be left unilaterally to the Soviet Union to define and dictate what is realistic detente policy and what is not. 2) True detente requires detente approximate military balance. 3) Real detente must be geographically indivisible. Europe cannot be an "island of detente" while our Eastern detente partner in Afghanistan seeks to force a people struggling for its right to self-determination into the yoke of communism through the brutal application of all means of military power. Now that the People's Republic of China has returned to the stage of world politics from its self-imposed isolation German foreign policy must not stop in Moscow.

As far as we are concerned, Ostpolitik is part of German foreign policy. For this reason it must include the People's Republic of China in its considerations as well. China's return to the stage of world politics and its opening to the United States, Japan and Europe marked the end of the world of Yalta which proceeded from two centers of world political power. As a great power in the Far East and as a future world power, and as an economic partner, China has brought about a new power ratio. Friendly relations with the earth's most populous country along with scientific-technical-economic cooperation are a commandment of realpolitik and are not directed against anybody. For this reason the impolite treatment accorded the Chinese head of government by Schmidt in Bonn was a mistake which is typical of him.

Question: Once you were elected chancellor, when would you visit State Council Chairman Honecker, and what do you expect to come from such a meeting?

Schmidt: Naturally not a great change, naturally not the removal of the Wall overnight. I had to postpone the visit reluctantly, but for reasons that are obvious to the Germans here and in the GDR, it will take palce when Mr Honecker and I consider the time favorable for talks which certainly will not deal with the maximum demands of one or the other, but with a balance of interests that will be advantageous to the Germans in both states.

Strauss: Since Helmut Schmidt's visit was canceled in the spring of 1980 by SED chief Honecker because of the Soviet attack on Afghanistan, and since we canceled his visit, on the other hand, because of the dangerous situation in Poland, the question about a meeting between me and SED chief Honecker is an insoluble calculation with too many unknowns. The question of whether I would be prepared to meet Erich Honecker depends on whether such a talk would bring alleviations and advantages for the people in the free and in the unfree parts of Germany. Such a talk presupposes the preparedness of East Berlin to also discuss the elimination of the criminal automatic firing installations at the German-German border and the lifting of the order to shoot for the GDR border troops. It must be made clear to the people in power in East Berlin that our considerable financial contributions depend not merely on the humanitarian alleviations granted by them but that our financial and economic help is connected with free access to Berlin, with free traffic of visitors between both parts of Germany and also with the elimination of the Wall and the death strip in due time. But since I am not a socialist illusionist, I know that the key for every decisive step forward in German-German relations does not lie in East Berlin but in Moscow.

Question: Do you think that the concern of the populace is justified that the high state debts will sooner or later lead to a new currency reform, a concern that has come about among the people in the course of the election campaign?

Schmidt: This propaganda of the Union parties is simply indecent. Our DM currency is the hardest and most attractive currency in the world--next to the Swiss franc.

Naturally there is a limit where taking credits must stop, be it by industrial firms, by home builders, by cities, the Federal Government or the laender. The limit is drawn by one's own financial efficiency. We have not reached that limit at all. We are further away from our limit than all the industrial states of the world with the exception of France. We have used the loaned money for investments in the future from which future generations will benefit. Should we have renounced an active employment policy? Some 900,000 jobs have been created in the past 3 years. Foreign countries admire us because of that. The voters will not be irritated by the opposition's campaign to create fear. If there were a new world economic crisis, I would again make loans to create jobs. It would almost be our duty--our legal duty!

Strauss: I am not worried about a drop in the currency value in the form of a devaluation of savings deposits and the issuance of new bills unless an unforeseeable catastrophe should take place. But we live in a state of permanent currency reform, because the inflation rates are much too high and because the actual inflation rate is higher than that officially announced. The people feel it and together with the irresponsible debts policy it fills the young people in our country with more and more concern. Not only the height of the Federal Government's debts of more than 200 billion creates concern, but also the speed of the increase (1949-69: 14 billion; 1970-74 under Brandt: 19 billion; 1975-80 under Schmidt: 153 billion).

The squandering of financing achieved through debts under Brandt and particularly Schmidt is ruinous exploitation of the next generation, and in the long run it will be tantamount to a drop in our currency's value.

Our pensioners should fear being cheated a second time after the elections because the SPD and the FDP have different pension plans. The SPD wants to increase pensions according to the gross wage principle, while the FDP wants to follow the net principle. Either the SPD or the FDP voters will be cheated if the SPD and FDP continue to rule. The ODU and the CSU will increase pensions according to the rise in gross wages not later than on 1 January 1982. The necessary means have been accumulated in the pension cashboxes. They must be used mainly for that purpose because the pensioners have a right not to be separated any longer from prosperity. Gifts to pensioners, as announced by the SPD which promised a minimum pension, cannot be financed. We must much rather turn the unemployed into people who pay their pension contributions in order to safeguard pensions in the long run.

Question: Did the pastoral letter of the Catholic bishops on the federal elections help or handicap you?

Schmidt: It has at any rate handicapped Mr Strauss. I am not so much interested in whom it has helped. The authors are now reacting to criticism in a language which is sometimes improper. It indicates that they are affected. The reaction also shows that the authors were wrong considering the effect it had on most German Catholics. They used CDU/CSU slogans. I am disappointed by the German Episcopate, disappointed not only politically but in human terms. Maybe it sounds petty--I do not mean it that way--if I say here that in the past 4 years I have spent endless hours in talks with Catholic Church representatives. In these talks none of the discussion partners has ever said even one syllable about the issue of state finances. I have felt in past days in many discussions how much the confidence of the Christians of both confessions has been endangered with regard to ecumenical cooperation. One only needs to read "Sonntagsblatt." It is absurd if my criticism of the pastoral letter is countered with the remark that whenever the churches touch on an allegedly unpleasant issue I want to deprive them of their right to comment. No, I am only concerned by the fact that the authority of the church should not be used for party purposes. It is amazing that the official Catholic Church has neither tried to help Rainer Barzel nor Helmut Kohl with a pastoral letter of that caliber, but it helped Franz Josef Strauss.

Really, I do not want any new disputes with the Roman Catholic Church--with wrong premises and in the wrong style of times that have passed long ago. But I will not quickly forget that pastoral word.

Strauss: This is not a matter of advantage or damage. I have always been against involving the clergy in politics or introducing politics into the church and into theology. But nobody can muzzle the church or forbid it to comment on issues that concern the church because of its mission. Pastoral letters and church memoranda are not instructions for Christian politicians.

It is up to the politician for whom church norms are important criteria to base his action on his own assessment of the concrete situation, an assessment on the basis of his own knowledge. I am so surprised by the offensive reaction of the federal chancellor to the pastoral letter of the German Catholic bishops only because particularly the leftist forces in his party very much welcome the words of bishops on worldly social problems, such as the words of the Polish or South American bishops.

Moreover, the debt problem is a problem of high and long-term moral significance.

Question: The term "political pension cheater" causes older voters to fear for the safety of their pensions. Do you think that a return to the gross wage oriented pension can be financed?

Schmidt: Yes, If I did not believe that, I would not have brought about the cabinet decision on the 21st pension adaptation bill, and I would not have signed the bill prior to its announcement in the federal legal gazette. The election campaign debate on that issue, incited by Mr Geissler, is supposed to make people forget that the return to a gross wage oriented pension--as they call it--is a valid right as of 1982. By the way, opinion polls demonstrate that you are not right in saying that older voters fear for the safety of their pensions. Mr Geissler's obvious campaign has backfired on him and the CDU/CSU. The vast majority of pensioners know that their current pensions are higher today than they have ever been--and they are quite content with this.

Strauss: The joint election campaign arbitration body has confirmed that the federal chancellor can rightly be called a political pension cheater. Prior to the 1976 elections Helmut Schmidt pretended that pension finances were in order. He told the pensioners that their pensions would keep increasing after 1976 along with the increase in gross wages. After the elections he arbitrarily cut the pension increases, drawing a political advantage from this because he was able to stay in power with the help of many voters he had cheated.

Because of that cheating on pensions, an average pensioner will get a pension this year that will be more than DM1,300 lower than otherwise. By 1990 the damage for the pensioner will amount to more than DM21,000, without including the interest involved.

Question: How many unemployed do you expect next year, and what must be done to achieve the best figure, what events could bring about the worst case?

Schmidt: Nobody can tell exactly how many people will be unemployed in the course of the next 12 months and when they will be unemployed--not exactly enough to permit a serious answer. No scientific institute can say that, no ministry, no Mr Stingl, no Federal Bank, no Mr Strauss and also no federal chancellor. We can only very roughly assess global economic trends. We all hope that nothing more will happen to the price of oil in 1981 than has happened already. I think that our own economic development will permit us to be rather well off and that the number of employed people will increase. It will not be as strong as in past years when we created 900,000 more jobs due to high state investment expenditures.

We know from past years that an increase here is not tantamount to a decrease in the number of unemployed. If an unemployed brother-in-law in your family finds a job again, while his wife simultaneously decides to take a part-time job without neglecting the care of her children, and if she does not immediately find such a job, then you have one more person who found a job as well as one more unemployed person. I do not see any need for programs to keep the economy going at the moment. First we must see what economic effects the considerable tax reductions will show that will come into effect on 1 January 1981.

Strauss: The labor market situation has deteriorated noticeably in past months compared with the year before. I fear that there will be far more than 1 million unemployed in the winter. The IFO Institute in its recent analysis of the economic situation expects about 1.1 million unemployed in 1981. If that takes place, we will be facing a greater economic setback than in 1975 when there were 4.7 percent unemployed, which was the lowest point of economic development in the Federal Republic.

The president of the Federal Labor Institute stated on 15 August: "If the trend simply goes on, I have to be pessimistic." Promotion of economic growth has priority for him over all other therapies. The CDU and the CSU will therefore turn their unlimited support for social market economy into an economic policy strengthening the businessman's innovation and willingness to invest. In this way we will create the prerequisites for bringing about promising jobs for the future. According to the recent experiences of the Federal Institute, people who are permanently unemployed or who have personal handicaps have a chance to get a job only if there is a lasting economic upswing. The CDU and the CSU will not accept having lasting unemployment at the expense of those involved. The reestablishment of full employment is not an election campaign slogan for us, but an urgent political task.

Question: Would you, whether you need to or not, rather rule together with the FDP or alone?

Schmidt: Realistically viewed, the question of ruling alone will not come up--although I really would not be worried by that. In such a case neither banks nor barber shops would be nationalized. But joking aside, the CDU/CSU slandering of Hans-Dietrich Genscher is evidence that the slogan about our jointly working together being at an end is foolish. Relations between the FDP chairman and myself have become closer and closer throughout the years, despite the fact that he and I have had sharp arguments occasionally. We do not want to make a union party of the SPD and the FDP, like Mr Strauss, who wants to mold the Union according to a CSU pattern.

Strauss: The present FDP, supporting a minister of the interior like Baum, considers itself merely as a means to continuing the socialist policy after the elections in Bonn. If there is a party that must accept the reproach that it has given into the hands of the SPD the power apparatus of national policy and of the financial and material potential that a Federal Government can mobilize thanks to the market economy, then this party is the FDP.

Question: It does not seem to matter to large parts of the young people whether they are ruled by Chancellor Schmidt or Chancellor Strauss. What can you offer to these young people?

Schmidt: The phrase "large parts" is not correct. Opinion polls, such as those of the Infratest Institute, demonstrate that if there were direct elections for the federal chancellor, which there are not, only 9 percent of the young people under 21 would vote for Franz Josef Strauss, while 76 percent--more than in any other age group--would vote for me.

Politicians and journalists are sometimes misled by the big noise of small groups. Some are full of critical questions--and rightly so. I know that young Germans work in an exemplary way in many places for our society.

I have in mind the large Christian youth organizations, the conscripts in the Bundeswehr, the conscientious objectors performing social services, the hundreds of thousands of young trade union members and 6 million young people in sport associations. I respect that. Young citizens have a right to answers.

However, I do not want to follow the modern trend of playing up to the young people by saying what they want to hear when I think their arguments are wrong. I am immune to a political youth mania. I do not like the word "offer." I am convinced that the great majority of young people, regardless of what they have to criticize, realize very well why I am asking them to support my domestic and foreign peace policy. Otherwise there can be no policy of continuous reforms.

Strauss: I consider it extremely bold to state that large parts of young people are politically indifferent. Our state would have a sad future if those do not care about their future who are the main subject of the political dispute, and for whose future it pays to become involved in politics. If you ask about what I offer to the young people, I would say: I do not carry a vendor's box with me, full of beautiful promises from which the young people can pick what they want free of charge. I also do not consider the youth a "fringe group of society" which basically and at all times needs the care and pampering of father state and mother bureaucracy.

We older people have the duty to leave an orderly house for the young where they can live their own active life in freedom, peace and without want. It is not our task, however, to pack the youth so carefully in the cotton of care that they will find it difficult or even impossible to be happy about their own achievement or their own success. The youth want to achieve something. Those who declare the youth a social case to be taken care of with a policy aimed at excluding risks discourage them, curtailing their freedom, giving them no goals, thus robbing them of the opportunity to shape their lives sensibly and responsibly.

The beginning of every sensible youth policy consists of not lowering the family to the position of an educational agency for the state. It must be reinstated as the first, most important community before the state with the rights it has in the Basic Law.

Question: Do you generally deem women suited for any political office, including that of chancellor? If so, can you think of a name?

Schmidt: Yes, I do. I can also visualize a woman as chancellor--and I am not saying this to curry favor with the women who complain that politics is more or less a domain of men. It is my conviction. I could name names, but I do not want to.

Strauss: Yes. The CDU and the CSU have thousands of active women in their ranks. Many women in the Union have carried responsibility in the foremost ranks for years. Just think of Helga Wex, for example, and of Renate Hellwig--both are members of my election team. Or think of Ministers Hanna-Renate Laurien in Rhineland-Palatinate, Annemarie Griesinger in Baden-Wuerttemberg, Birgit Breugel in Lower Saxony, and of my deputy in the party, Mathilde Berghofer-Weichner. So far no woman has run for the office of chancellor in the Federal Republic, but why shouldn't German women become just as successful "stateswomen" in the future as were and are Golda Meir in Israel and Margaret Thatcher in Great Britain, for example?

Question: In what characteristic features attributed to you do you feel most misunderstood?

Schmidt: I do not much like the label of "manipulator" which has not really applied to me for a long time. I think that this term also expresses something quite favorable. Still, it is an impermissible simplification. This label, which journalists stuck on me, has been recognized as such by many people, not because they occasionally see me playing the organ or talking with writers, but because they have read some of my speeches that do not deal with daily problems.

Formerly my designation as the "sergeant" hurt me a little. It is no longer being used against me now. Word has made the rounds that I am not a friend of decisions made in isolation, but rather seek discussion and listen to the advice of others.

Strauss: It is not a matter of misunderstandings at all. Every person can form a judgement without bias on the basis of what I say and do and on the basis of what sober contemporaries say about me. When nowadays some of the very politicians who appreciated and praised me as finance minister in the grand coalition claim that I "lack self-control and circumspection" and that "I do not have myself under control," it is not a misunderstanding but sheer slander. I think rationally and coolly, as everybody knows, and I speak passionately—as everybody knows as well. I say what I think, and unlike my top political adversaries, my whole life is completely open to inspection. There is neither a period of darkness in my life nor a political flaw.

But I do want one thing with all the passion that I can muster: not only halting but even reversing the march into a socialist society of the future, begun in 1969, and into a neutralized Europe more or less delivered to the Soviet sphere of power.

Question: How would you have tackled the German problems of the year 1932?

Schmidt: I was all of 14 years old at the time. If one had had the knowledge of the causes and course of the world economic crisis, the Reich governments would presumably have acted in a different way. We, at any rate, have drawn conclusions. We recognized similar dangers, averted them and coped quite well with the turbulences in the wake of a dramatic crisis of the world economy triggered by the explosion in oil prices. The institution of an annual world economic conference introduced, even invented, by Giscard d'Estaing and myself has become one of the most important instruments for preventing the struggle of everybody against everybody else which turned the thirties into a world economic disaster.

Strauss: The question seems a bit unfair to me because the person looking back at history and judging and condemning those who acted at the time is free from the compulsion of making a decision. Naturally any contemporary politician will say that he would have done everything entirely differently than did Bruening. Today, we know that it was wrong for Bruening to embark on the course of radically cutting state spending, on the one hand, and hiking taxes, on the other; it was wrong to govern with a system of emergency ordinances; it was wrong to hope that he would gain a broad majority in the Reichstag, including the Social Democrats, for his planned restorative constitutional amendment. The two most urgent problems of that year, containment of political extremism from left and right, could not be solved by him in this way. But let us not forget that in his measures Bruening had the backing of Reich President Luther as well as of most representatives of the science of finance of that time. At the time the theories of Keynes, of an overall national economic account and an anticyclical financial policy were not the general property of science. Besides, the struggle against the enemies of the state had to be waged in the painful knowledge that the Weimar Republic was not supported by many Germans.

What therefore ensues is a paradox: Only a Reich chancellor who experienced the collapse of the Weimar Republic and recognized its causes clearly could have prevented this very collapse by relaxing the strict deflationary course and properly assessing the destructive force of leftist and rightist extremism. The Weimar Republic could have been saved only through an alliance of the parties of the center including the SPD, the trade unions and the Reichswehr—and Hindenburg would have gone along, too.

Question: Which qualities do you esteem most in your opponent?

Schmidt: Here may I be allowed to quote what I said in the ZDF series "Personal Data" in 1966, that is, 14 years ago: "Strauss is an immensely talented man. He is a man with great abilities, a great variety of abilities.

He has a very good education, a good memory, a brilliant eloquence; he can capture a round of professors just as he can captivate a gigantic assembly of people. Power of decison, energy, probably also courage. On the other hand, this great amount of abilities, all of which by themselves are desirable for a politician and which also turn this Strauss into the bundle of energy that he is, is set off, I believe, by a lack of self-control. There, I am not quite sure whether Strauss knows ahead of time what he will say..."

Strauss: His talent to convey as correct to the people comparisons that are unfounded.

Question: When have you lost your temper?

Schmidt: I do not think that I have lost my temper in public even once. At the time I received the nickname "Schmidt the Lip" [Schmidt-Schnauze] I often reacted quite sharply. Occasionally I can become very impatient or blow my stack. This happens rarely, and then only in a small circle. If I ever have offended anybody I usually have asked forgiveness afterwards as well.

Strauss: When my son (Franz Georg) played the "Flea's Waltz" on the piano for the hundredth time within an hour. But that was more than 10 years ago, and my son has long forgiven me the "dressing down" of that time. Today he probably plays this tune, which seems to be beyond eradication, only occasionally.

Question: Do you consider your election campaign opponent adequately capable of not losing self-control in his handling of power?

Schmidt: No.

Strauss: The loss of self-control in handling power is not only reflected by the fact that the powerful man goes beyond the bounds set for him by law and constitution. Likewise anyone misuses power who fails to use it or uses it only on the basis of opportunism. And this is exactly what Helmut Schmidt does whenever he is afraid the leftwingers of his own party will refuse to follow him. Let me just cite the following catchwords in this context: Forked tongue on the question of enhancement of nuclear energy, gradual loosening up of the Western alliance through alienation, especially toward the United States, the hasty policy on the East and on Germany which is only too ready to make advance concessions. Besides, this same man who is so very much imbued with his allegedly northern German cool and calm air that he already considers this expressive of a statesmen's greatness, does not stop at abusing the CDU/CSU as "incapable of peace" and disparaging my person with expressions such as "arsonist, troublemaker, berserk, trade union destroyer and man without decency." This, too, I consider misuse of the power granted to the chancellor by the Basic Law. His irate invectives against the bishops, the threats and announcements uttered, prove that he does not have enough self-control in handling power. On the other hand, he is too weak to prevail over the leftwing radicals in his party or to dismiss the scandalous Minister Baum.

Question: When and on what occasion did you notice signs of intolerance and lust for power on your part, and when did you notice it on the part of your competitor?

Schmidt: As regards myself, others are better suited to assess that. I do not want to present myself as Nathan the wise, and I really have no talent for Bonapartism.

As regards Mr Strauss, I will content myself with the statement that this politician divides our people more and more. I think that this is not a subjective judgment but an exact statement. He creates discord among the people because he is as he is.

Strauss: I would not have became a politician if I shied back from power or even despised it. He who seeks a state office must be prepared to exert power: in the framework of our moral principles, in the framework of the constitution and the laws, in control, periodically replaceable, and morally responsible.

He must act for state power being firmly used against the enemies of democracy and of our liberal constitutional system. Such an attitude may look "domineering" from the perspective of those endulging in anarchist dreams. I call it responsibly dealing with power. As regards intolerance, who likes to admit that he is beset by it? One ought to ask the people with whom I deal daily or at least frequently: my family members, friends, colleagues. But if I must give an answer: I am tolerant except in moments when I am beset with the above described "Bavarian fury," which is not evil, because otherwise it would be a crime according to Thomas Mann. As regards occasional or frequent lust for power or intolerance with regard to Helmut Schmidt, one ought to be fair enough to ask those living and working in his immediate environment or who are subjects of his lack of self-control.

Question: Would you be prepared in an emergency to be vice chancellor in the cabinet of your election campaign opponent?

Schmidt: No. I cannot imagine doing that with Mr Strauss now, particularly since I consider him an unpredictable man in an hour of need.

We would safeguard in some other way the cooperation of all parties in a great emergency involving our people. But such an emergency is not on the horizon. Moreover, I am using all my strength to avoid the coming about of such an emergency and for Mr Strauss not to become chancellor on 5 October.

Strauss: I have always stressed that political parties and democratic politicians ought to basically and mutually declare their eligibility to form a coalition and to cooperate. I have demonstrated this as my approach in practice, despite all the sharpness of political disputes.

I consider a grand coalition an outspoken emergency solution. If it must be accepted to avoid negative developments for our people which otherwise could not be avoided, there is nothing else one can do. If really a most drastic aggravation came about, such as the danger of war or a grave economic crisis as a consequence of Soviet action involving our vital flanks, every chancellor in office would have to say: I need the most important man of the opposition so that we can master the situation together.

POLITICAL LEADERS DISCUSS FOREIGN, SECURITY POLICIES

DW301732 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2015 GMT 29 Sep 80

[Excerpts from roundtable discussion "Germany Prior to the Elections" conducted by reporters Theo M. Loch and Peter Schulz with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel, Lower Saxony Finance Minister Walter Leisler Kiep and Manfred Woerner, chairman of the Bundestag Defense Policy Committee; place not given—live or recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] Assuming that the CDU/CSU will win the Bundestag elections, what concrete steps would you undertake as the future foreign minister to improve relations with the United States, which the opposition considers as upset, without abandoning the Federal Republic's independent foreign policy?

[Kiep] The most important thing would be to make a careful analysis of the world situation in the early eighties, together with the U. S. Administration which will be elected in early November. After the analysis an attempt must be made to find the resulting common interests, what common policy will be possible and necessary to pursue considering that the balance of forces between the East and the West and the common action of the alliance are the prerequisite of safeguarding peace.

In such a talk or analysis it will be important to stress the things one has in common as well as the special interests of the Federal Republic of Germany due to its geographic location as divided country on the seam between the East and the West with an open flank—Berlin.

Through Berlin it will automatically be included in all tensions of the world, so to speak. That must be included in the analysis in order to find out what one can do together and what one possibly cannot do together because of the special situation of Germany. Out of this a common Western policy should be developed for the Eighties.

[Genscher] I believe that the opposition is caught in a contradiction. We all know that the Federal Republic's foreign policy is imbedded in a joint Western policy of the European Community as well as of the Western alliance. I would consider it dangerous, frankly speaking, if the opposition speaks of the need for a change or turn of foreign policy. It would practically mean bringing up the question of where a change or turn should take place, where we will quit the common Western policy.

I want to quote three examples: The opposition was against the signing of the final document of Helsinki. All the Western states were in favor of this. The opposition considered the signal the federal chancellor and I brought back from Moscow for the initiation of negotiations on medium-range arms as a means to exert pressure on the United States, but the United States as well as all the other allies and we ourselves believe that negotiations must begin now. That has been agreed between the U.S. secretary of state and the Soviet foreign minister. The Americans, we and all the Western partners believed that we ought to help Poland without interfering in their internal affairs by voicing prerequisites. The opposition wanted to voice prerequisites. Seen that way, I really believe Mr Strauss ought to go to America, even if he is not a federal chancellor, in order to settle the upset relations between the oppostion and the United States and not between the Federal Republic and the United States.

[Woerner] Despite all my appreciation of the irony the foreign minister has demonstrated here, there is, for example, the incontestable problem involving reactions on Afghanistan. The United States and the Europeans were not of the same opinion and as before there is no agreement in this respect. It is equally incontestable that the American President repeatedly has voiced his discontent that the Europeans are obviously lagging behind with regard to sanctions. It is equally obvious that one has not succeeded up to this day--particularly not in coordinated American-European talks, in achieving a common Western answer to the Soviet Union's permanent expansion of power.

[Apel] I find that we should not make general statements but get down to facts. If we do that, we will find, for example, that we in the Federal Republic of Germany did not go to the Olympic games out of solidarity with the United States. The federal chancellor and Foreign Minister Genscher have discussed Afghanistan in no uncertain terms in Moscow. If anybody has said plainly how matters are, it was the two of them representing our country.

As regards sanctions, one can demonstrate these days with the Gildemann case that merely suspicion has been sowed. We keep to all international agreements. We do not supply anything to the Soviet Union that has not jointly been agreed on. I believe that Mr Kiep and Mr Strauss must correct their course.

[Question] Is the Bundeswehr's position within NATO sufficient, or must it be improved?

[Woerner] The Bundeswehr makes a considerable contribution to the alliance. Nobody will contest that. But there are a number of shortcomings which must be improved. First of all, there is going to be a financial gap that will make it more and more difficult for the Bundeswehr to maintain its procurement projects. We have personnel problems, considerable problems with the service time of the soldiers and with their chances to be promoted. There is a shortage of ammunition and equipment materiel at the the moment. I hear that we will not be able to pay some parts of the bill this year.

There are no doubts that the Bundeswehr in its present form is unable to take some of the burden from the Americans, something we want to do because the Americans may want to increase their presence in the Indian Ocean or the Persian Gulf.

I will frankly tell you about my greatest concern: We are losing our defense preparedness! It is most important for the quality of an army, for the quality of territorial defense as a whole. I say the following to the defense ministers: I find that if it is impossible in the SPD to implement a common approach to defense problems, if young socialists demonstrate together with communists against the Bundeswehr in Bremen, if the SPD is not able any more to keep defense preparedness under control, it will be extremely difficult to maintain our defense preparedness with regard to the young generation and with regard to our people as a whole.

[Apel] I will begin with the Bundeswehr's position in NATO. A single opinion exists reaching from Washington to Moscow: It is one of the best armies in the world. Manfred Woerner has just admitted this too. I fully realize that naturally everything could be much better and that I will be facing financial problems in the coming years. We will manage the financial problems in any case. We will not be able to procure everything the military wants to have. But if we then were to make an international comparison, we would find that we continue to hold a very good position.

That is a great problem, because the more we do, the more we will be prepared to say that we will do this and that and take over the other, the more we then will run the risk that others, such as the Belgians, the Dutch and the Danes will say: That is fine, we can withdraw and the Germans will take over our tasks. One must carefully see to it that this does not take place.

[Question] Is detente divisible?

[Genscher] Detente cannot be divisible because we live in a world that is growing more and more close together. The fact that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is a subject of our present debate demonstrates that we do not consider it impertinent to create a connection between the composition of the government in the Federal Republic of Germany and the invasion in Afghanistan.

There was a CDU government when the Russians invaded Hungary. I do not hold you responsible for that, but please do not pretend that your absence from the government was the reason, or one of two reasons for the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. The alliance is quite all right.

The situation is the following: We in Europe have achieved a certain stabilization of the situation due to detente policy. We can see this quite clearly if we view the following developments: war in Iraq and Iran, a continuing crisis in Afghanistan—and all of this does not affect Berlin, which has been the case in the past. I consider that progress and not a disadvantage.

We must make it clear to the Soviet Union with Western reactions that detente will not stand another strike of that kind. That has been put down in the German-French statement. We ought to give some thought to whether the events in Poland, which we observed very closely would have developed the way they did if we did not have detente in Europe but cold war. There were similar liberalization tendencies in the past: In Czechoslovakia in 1968, in Hungary in 1956 and in the GDR in 1953; they all found a grave end. Under the prerequisites of detente it was possible to make a certain step forward in Poland. I consider that as positive.

[Question] Is there any alternative to a security policy which will not inevitably lead to an arms race?

[Genscher] Colleague Kiep, it is my opinion that the treaty policy indeed has been completed to a point where we have settled the bilateral problems with Eastern Europe.

The detente process has not been historically concluded, it must continue. And now comes the question as to the dimensions in which this is to be done. In this respect the determining factor for the eighties will be the question concerning the arms control and disarmament.

[Apel] This is exactly the problem. We have created a certain groundwork of mutual confidence. Where distrust becomes most plainly visible--namely on the part of the military--we are only at the beginnings. This is quite evident. But I am warning against considering these 7 years as having failed, for the negotiations in themselves were quite valuable. They led to a point where the questions, for instance, of how many troops do you actually have in Poland, in the GDR, in the CSSR, and how many do we think you have, have become points of debate which lead both sides to the finding that here we must go on working. And I think we will still need a lot of time in that respect.

[Question] What do you propose to do to cut down this arms race? Or should the policies boil down to temporizing until the Soviet Union comes round to seeing reason?

[Apel] Detente policy during the past decade was not a policy of illusions but, on the German side, supported with defense efforts which also took effect. This was not true for all the countries of Western Europe. The second part of my answer: Afghanistan cannot be resolved through military means. It can be solved only with diplomacy and with development aid, with a concentrated action. I think the Western strategy is not so bad. We cannot contrive to push the Soviet Union out of Afghanistan. This is a long diplomatic process.

[Genscher] We assume that security can be had only as a result of balance. If one side--the Soviet Union--seeks superiority, then this superiority must be balanced through arms efforts of our own. This is uncontested. The second point is, however, that anyone trying to establish the balance this way will end up in a nonsensical arms race; and this is why arms control is necessary. Hence, our proposal: Negotiations on medium-range missiles; establishment of a European disarmament conference so as to create confidence-building measures for all of Europe; activation of the MBFR negotiations in Vienna; the need for ratifying SALT II. These constitute concrete steps for achieving a containment of the arms race. This has nothing in common with illusions, for this is offset by the readiness to close the arms gap wherever the Soviet Union violates the balance by an armament lead. But I warn against seeing the remedy solely through the closure of the arms gap.

[Question] Which concrete, tangible humanitarian improvements are attainable at all in inter-German relations?

[Genscher] It is my view that it must be our objective to open the way into the Federal Republic for younger GDR people as well. We do not have as great a communication standard with the GDR as we maintain with other East European states. Here we must go on negotiating step by step. I think the option of meeting is the strongest asset. I really wish that every graduating class from our country would first of all plan on visiting a town in the GDR too. This would also constitute and opportunity for personal meetings which should be exploited.

[Kiep] The two gentlemen pretend that the CDU/CSU is about to call detente policy in question. Meanwhile, the entire U. S. public is in a process of new assessment of the U. S. interests after 10 years of efforts for better relations with the Soviet Union, the result being that everybody in the United States says that things just cannot go on as they do. We must restore the balance, for it is only on the basis of balance and of the indivisibility of detente that we have a chance of making any headway.

[Question] What security-policy options does the Federal Republic have to exert influence on the developments in the Gulf region.

[Genscher] To begin with, the goal must be to confine the conflict to the countries in which it is transpiring at the moment. Secondly, our entire North-South policy must be concentrated on strengthening the efforts for independence of the countries of the Third World by stabilizing them internally, on making them independent states and preventing us from being victimized by the temptation of either rejecting these states by saying that they are too close to Moscow, or pulling them over to our side. An independent Third World is the best guarantee for stability of peace in the Third World.

[Woerner] To begin with, a mission of the Bundeswehr in the Middle East: No! Yet we cannot just ignore this threat. This is where the oil is which we need, this is our jugular vein. Even if the danger is located outside the alliance we must come up with an answer. What must this answer be? In my opinion it must have two parts. What is required, first, is an intensification of the political and economic cooperation with the states located there; secondly, what the alliance needs is a division of labor answer to the question as to who will ensure through a military presence that the Soviet Union will not advance there any further. As matters stand this could only be the Americans. This is why we say: Coordinate in the alliance on the basis of a division of labor with the roles divided up in economic, political, and military respects; with the Bundeswehr not involved but instead with the Federal Republic and Europe relieving the Americans here in Europe.

[Apel] All of us need to know that we have article 87A of the Basic Law which provides for the assignment of German troops only for the purpose of territorial defense. Anyone toying with other ideas--this is also impossible for German naval vessels--is talking at odds with the Basic Law. My second remark: division of labor in the alliance--agreed. Work is being done on that. Yet it is only under two conditions that I would be prepared to discuss this issue and to hold discussions subsequently as well. The first condition is that it should not involve the Germans alone. This alliance is running the great risk of becoming an organization with different kinds of membership. There are no passive members in NATO. The second condition is that it must be clear that the Americans remain fully present here in central Europe with their ground forces, with their air forces. For if they were to leave here--even just partially--we would be exposed to the grave danger that the deterrence in central Europe might grow brittle since it is also based on the fact that many allies, especially the Americans, are present here apart from the Bundeswehr. These are my two conditions, and this is what we are debating. Then we will submit proposals to the defense committee. The whole thing then will turn into a comparable expensive operation.

[Question] It is always being said here with reference to the Basic Law that a mission of the Bundeswehr outside the NATO area is prohibited. But it happened in the past several occasions that the United Nations formed so-called peace forces which were assigned, for instance, to the border area of Israel. If Germany were asked now to put up a troop contingent as well, for instance for the Iraq/Iran area, what would the answer be?

[Kiep] I do not wish to comment on the question. All I know is that the United Nations organization as well as our Basic Law expressly includes the contribution to a collective peace-keeping operation, and if the United Nations were to do this, which would be a purely hypothetical case, we surely would have to do it as well. Today I heard a lot about the need for safeguarding peace in the Middle East and in the Near East, in the world at large. Mr Foreign Minister, do you believe that it serves peace and the predictability of German foreign policy, the continuity and predictability of our foreign policy, if the other side in this election campaign--and clearly you, Mr Apel--constantly claims that a change in responsibility in the Federal Republic of Germany will bring us closer to World War III. I believe that this in itself is the most peace-endangering utterance which we have heard from a German mouth lately on this whole subject.

[Genscher] I think it is a political utterance destabilizing the balance if the Union demands a reversal and a change in German foreign policy in an undifferentiated manner.

This is what your colleague Von Wrangel has said, This is what your program contains in writing: A change in German foreign policy. You would have to make this clear. If you said you intend to continue the policy unchanged, if you averred this today, this would be highly important to us with respect to the predictability of our foreign policy. Anybody having any common sense at all will not suggest this about World War III to another democratic party. I did not like the discussion on the security in the Third World a while ago. You discussed the military aspect of it too much. What was neglected too much was the question of what we might contribute toward achieving social and economic conditions there which will make these countries stable. If you pump the Third World full of arms while the people go hungry, there will be wars there. And this is why I tell you that the primary thing is development aid.

GENSCHER CITES STANCE ON IRAQ-IRAN CONFLICT

LD301216 Hamburg DPA in German 1101 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 30 Sep (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has stated that, with its EC partners, the Federal Government supports the maintenance of the free movement of shipping in the Persian Gulf, which is "vital for the entire community of states." In a speech to the Second World Congress of Soviet and East European Studies in Garmisch-Partenkirchen today, Genscher announced readiness to support any international initiative likely to lead to a political solution of the conflict between Iraq and Iran.

Genscher said that the war between the two countries further threatens the stability of the Mideast region, which is already uneasy enough. The most important immediate objective must be to prevent the conflict from spreading and leading to an East-West dispute with even more dangerous consequences. So far it has been possible to localize the conflict, which is not least the result of the interest of important powers in preserving the process of detente. Genscher said that the beginning of the Eighties will bring forth developments which contain great dangers for the Europeans. In addition to the conflict between Iraq and Iran he mentioned the tense situation in the Middle East, the latent dangers of the arms race, the struggle with regard to the distribution of increasingly scarce raw materials and the gap between North and South.

GOVERNMENT SETS OUT INTENTIONS FOR MADRID CSCE

LD302030 Hamburg DPA in German 1602 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--The Federal Government on Tuesday once again described a European disarmament conference as one of its major aims at the Madrid review of the European security conference. In a reply to a parliamentary question by the SPD and FDP on the future of detente, published on Tuesday, the government says that the proposed disarmament conference should adopt "militarily significant confidence-building measures applicable throughout Europe." The conference was proposed by France, and the Federal Government is taking a major part in transforming this French proposal into a joint Western position. Bonn wants a political debate at the Madrid meeting on basic issues of East-West relations to give a fresh impetus to detente. The Federal Government will stress the importance of the humanitarian element and emphasize that confidence should be built by concrete measures in the military field rather than by mainly declaratory proposals. Another Bonn aim is to call a high-level meeting on energy.

The GDR's conduct will be measured in terms of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, the Federal Government's reply states. This Final Act is of great importance for relations between the two German states. The Final Act has facilitated efforts to overcome the situation that arose in Poland.

The reply says that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan "dealt a heavy blow" to general East-West relations. At the Madrid review conference the Federal Government will point out this violation of the Helsinki principles.

AB301915 Paris AFP in French 1626 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] Paris, 30 Sep (AFP)--The president of Gabon, Mr Omar Bongo, began his 4-day official visit to France on Tuesday. The Gabonese head of state was welcomed at the Paris airport by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing. After the military honors were rendered, the two heads of state, accompanied by their spouses, gave two short speeches in the VIP lounge of the airport.

President Giscard d'Estaing first of all recalled France's deep attachment to Gabon, 10 years after President Bongo's first official visit ot France. On bilateral matters, the French head of state indicated that he would study with his guest means of strengthening a very intense cooperation. The Gabonese delegation comprises several ministers, in particular, Mr Martin Bongo, minister of foreign affairs and cooperation; Mr Edouard-Alexis Mboumy-Boutsit, minister of mines, energy and hydraulic resources; and Mr Jean-Pierre Lemboumba-Lepandou, minister of economy and finance. The two heads of state, who arrived in the center of the capital by helicopter, were to have a first meeting in the Elysee immediately following their arrival.

NEWSPAPER CARRIES DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE ELECTION MANIFESTO

LD291447 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Sep 80 pp 4, 9

[Apparent text of Democratic Alliance election manifesto: "Democratic Alliance Wishes To Modernize Country and Advance Toward Europe"]

[Excerpts] Portugal and the Portuguese people spoke out on 2 December 1979 against ambiguity and for clarity, against insecurity and for stability, and against socialist bureaucracy and for liberating change. The Portuguese people are called on to confirm on 5 October 1980 their faith in the program which they have already chosen. In the name of that program, Portugal won in 1979. In its name, it will win again in 1980.

What Is at Stake in the Elections

A European Model of Society

We want a European and Western society to live and prosper in our country: a society in which cultural, social and ideological pluralism will be respected; in which freedom will be practiced and responsibility exercised; in which the enterprise and creativeness of citizens and social groups will be developed; in which progress will be made toward increasingly improved forms of political, economic and social democratization; in which the state will serve the dignity of the human individual; in which lawful political power will be exercised without impositions by economic power and without coercion by military sectors; and in which social solidarity and a sense of justice will govern relations among citizens and between them and the state.

A Stable and Constructive Government

Portugal needs more than ever a government capable of stably and consistently adopting and implementing a national and democratic blueprint. Portugal must not have over the next 4 years the six different governments which it had over the last 4 years; it must not have again a different government every 8 months. Only in the Democratic Alliance does the ability exist to guarantee this aim.

A Genuine Democratic System

The Constitution of the Republic will have to be radically revised in accordance with the lines advocated by the Democratic Alliance, to guarantee; all human individual freedoms and rights; the unity of the state and regionalization; the power of citizens to choose through the ballot box the programs of national, regional or local government which most appeal to them at all times; the subordination of the armed forces to the democratic political power; and the abolition of the Council of the Revolution.

What We Propose

To Unite the Portuguese People

To unite the Portuguese people around the aims of a freer country, a more prosperous nation and a more democratic state.
To unite the Portuguese people around a truly democratic constitution, so that the basic law can be a subject of consensus and not a source of bitter discord.

To Create Wealth and Distribute It Justly

The Democratic Alliance government has observed some simple principles in its economic policy: national private enterprise has the principal role in the correct utilization of the Portuguese people's creative energies and Portugal's natural resources; the public sector must not constitute a burden and must be profitable and productive and a factor of progress for the community; cooperative activity, guided by principles of independence, deserves constant support and encouragement.

To Struggle Against Inflation and Unemployment

Preserving the workers' purchasing power will remain our major aim.
We intend to conduct a broad debate on the introduction of an organized prices and incomes policy.
We expect an important contribution from the accelerated modernization of Portuguese agriculture.
The creation of employment must be achieved through greater activation of the money market, investment and full utilization of existing production capacity.

Priority for Most Underprivileged

It is our aim to drastically reduce the number of unemployed and to correctly distribute and administrate unemployment benefits to reduce the effects of the economic crisis on the members of the population capable of working.

The social and occupational integration of the disabled and their training in an adequate manner will constitute a basic concern of the government.

The elderly must find further protection over the next 4 years through state action and aid from the local authorities and private institutions.

Living conditions in prisons and the improvement of assistance schemes for prisoners' families will be considered.

The gradual elimination of slums and the restoration of dilapidated housing and its possible modernization, specifically with respect to basic sanitation, will be a constant challenge to the Democratic Alliance government.

To Consolidate Democracy and Regionalize the Country

Democracy is an irreversible fact of our collective life. We intend to consolidate it and fully guarantee it immediately at the political level.

Following the revision of the constitution, the armed forces will be subordinate to the democratic political power. We propose that regionalization, as a means for making the decisionmaking process more participatory and more democratic, should be a key topic of our national reflection over the next 4 years.

To Modernize Portugal and Advance Toward Europe

To advance toward Europe is not to reject the past of coexistence with peoples of other continents. With a stable Democratic Alliance government for 4 years and a president of the republic such as General Soares Carneiro, capable of maintaining loyal and real institutional and political solidarity with the government chosen by the people, the Portuguese people will have the best political preconditions for tackling the enormous tasks of modernizing Portugal.

PAPER REPORTS FOREIGN MINISTER OLESEN TALKS WITH GROMYKO

[RITZAUS BUREAU report: "Talks Between Gromyko and Kjeld Olesen"]

[Text] Washington--On Friday, Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen had an hour-long meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko at the Soviet UN Mission in New York. The two foreign ministers discussed a number of bilateral and international questions, and the meeting took place in a relaxed and frank atmosphere, according to Kjeld Olesen. Soviet UN [as published] Ambassador Anatoliy Dobrynin also took part in the talks between Kjeld Olesen and Andrey Gromyko.

The Soviet foreign minister stressed to Kjeld Olesen the good bilateral relations that exist between Denmark and the Soviet Union, and for his part Kjeld Olesen stressed the Danish Government's concern over the East-West problem in the current tense international situation.

Foreign Minister Olesen took the opportunity to brief Andrey Gromyko on the Danish Government's wider definition of security problems, including, for example, the question of a new international economic world order and the problems of North-South relations. Kjeld Olesen also pointed out that Denmark has taken an initiative on making a study of conventional arms in connection with disarmament efforts, and he asked the Soviet foreign minister directly whether support in this connection could be expected from the Soviet Union, but Gromyko did not give a direct answer.

Kjeld Olesen gave an account of the Danish Government's view of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, but did not go into details on this issue. Kjeld Olesen expressed the Danish Government's satisfaction that agreement had been reached between the U.S. and Soviet Governments on the resumption of negotiations in Geneva next month on long-range [as published] tactical nuclear arms.

He also briefed Gromyko on the proposal, that the Danish Government put forward in NATO last December, for a 6-month moratorium on so-called Eurostrategic arms, and he took the opportunity to chide Gromyko with the fact that this Danish proposal only merited four or five lines in the Soviet newspaper PRAVDA.

Andrey Gromyko said the Soviet Union makes the ratification of the SALT II agreement a condition for the completion of the coming negotiations in Geneva. Kjeld Olesen told the Soviet foreign minister that the Danish Government in its speech to the UN General Assembly recently had precisely supported the notion of the swift ratification of the SALT II agreement.

Kjeld Olesen also gave an account of the Danish defense policy debate and he took the opportunity to point to the marked increase in Soviet forces, especially in the Baltic area and in northern Europe. Here Gromyko answered that he thought it only natural that the Soviet Union should develop its defense forces and the quality of its arms systems in this part of the world too.

CAGATAY COMMENTS ON INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS, IRAN-IRAQ WAR

TA281410 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 28 Sep 80

[Text] The Prime Minister and president of the National Unity Party, Mr Cagatay, has said that with the latest proposals the Turkish Cypriot side had brought the Cyprus intercommunal talks to a stage where the Greek Cypriot side had to prove its good will. Mr Cagatay was speaking this morning at a congress of the National Unity Party meeting in Nicosia. He stressed the conviction that the only solution to the Cyprus problem was through intercommunal talks and for this reason, the Turkish Cypriots were attending these talks with good will. He repeated that good will from the Greek Cypriot side was a necessity if the talks were to succeed. He reiterated that the Turkish Cypriot side was awaiting with interest the Greek Cypriot response to the proposals it had made on Wednesday.

Mr Cagatay said that one of the points in the Turkish Cypriot proposals was the lifting of the inhuman Greek Cypriot economic embargo against the Turkish Cypriot community. He stressed that such an action by the Greek Cypriot side would pave the way to the establishment of an atmosphere of peace in the island and assist in a political solution. He added that the socio-economic difficulties facing the Turkish Cypriot community were being adversely affected by the delay in the political solution of the Cyprus problem. Mr Cagatay called on the Turkish Cypriot opposition parties to cooperate with the government in efforts to overcome those difficulties.

Prime Minister Cagatay also referred to the current conflict between Iran and Iraq and pointed out that this conflict which was taking place at one of the most important oil-producing centers of the world would inevitably affect the production of crude oil and create unbearable increases in the cost of oil and oil products. He stressed that it was natural that the federated state's economy should also be affected by these developments. He said that the Turkish Cypriot community should be prepared to face new sacrifices in the efforts to overcome the economic difficulties which would face it because of the conflict in Iran and Iraq. Following Mr Cagatay's address, the National Unity Party congress continued its work in closed session.

CYPRUS MAIL REPORTS PRO-KIPRIANOU PARAMILITARY GROUP

[Excerpts] The editor of the Greek Cypriot weekly "AMMOKHOSTOS" (FAMAGUSTA), Mr Nikos Falas, was yesterday brought before the Nicosia District Court and charged with publishing "false news likely to undermine public order and shake the confidence of the public to the state and to disturb the peace". The charge is connected with a report in his paper yesterday in which he said that a secret organisation codenamed "K7" had been formed in order to keep President Kiprianou in power "with dynamic means" if the government budgets were voted down.

The report claimed that the organisation was masterminded by officers of the Cyprus Army attached to the national guard in key positions. It also alleged that the leaders of the organisation are trying to widen their organisation and secure "unrecorded" modern "equipment". The aim, it said, was to keep Kiprianou in the presidency by all means even if he lost the support of the public and if he was under pressure from the parties to resign.

"The seven founders of the organisation, the report said (evidently the K7 denoted that seven were the leaders) were determined to support the president "with dynamic means" if AKEL and splinters of the Democratic Party forced Kiprianou to resign. As a footnote the report said: "Reports that the seven had secured the support of an influential figure before they formed the organisation could not be corroborated. But the seven are known for their political affinities and their friendly relations with the government."

I VRADHINI: 'WAR OF NERVES' NOT AFFECTING DECISIONS ON NATO

AT301559 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 30 Sep 80 pp 1-2

[From the "Evening" column: "Scottish Bath?"]

[Text] Many reports have been published in Athens newspapers on the substance of the talks between Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis with his U.S. counterpart, E. Muskie. These reports, together with dispatches from Brussels, reports on the talks between Mrs Thatcher and Rallis, and interviews and statements of Turkish diplomats who represent the new Turkish military regime, have created some confusion since they contradict each other on various points. Thus, the issue of Greece's return to the joint military command of the Atlantic Alliance is sometimes presented as almost being solved—very soon, actually before the 1st of December, according to one dispatch—and sometimes as being complicated; sometimes Ankara is presented as being more flexible and sometimes as being more touch; and the Greek Government is sometimes presented as determined and sometimes as "bluffing".... We believe that under such circumstances, an effort to clarify things somewhat would be useful.

This period of international tension in the wake of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the war between Iran and Iraq does not at all lead itself to being a "Scottish bath" [alternating hot and cold water]. However, these alternations of channeled optimism and pessimism, of smiles and coolness can only be liked to an effort to have us endure a "Scottish bath".... The "war of nerves" that is being waged is obvious; also obvious is the need to maintain our equanimity and not be influenced by alternating warm and cool waves....

The Greek Government has expressed the wish for a return because it has assessed that this best serves national security. However, we believe that this return benefits not only Greece but also the Alliance; it also benefits Turkey which, without this return, will remain isolated.

The issue is between Greece and the Alliance, and since the latter is truly interested in the return, which will restore the cohesion of its Southeastern Flank, it need only prove it in practice. It has had plenty of time to do so. However, after all this wasted time the Alliance cannot seriously appear to be in haste. It cannot seriously suggest that we take note of the Turkish "veto." It cannot be serious when, on the one hand, it gives billions of dollars to Turkey for the sake of the Alliance and, on the other hand, allows Ankara to torpedo the Alliance itself by making one of its wings useless at the expense of its own interests. And of course it cannot seriously attempt to blame Greece for Turkish chauvinistic intransigence.

We do not intend to be influenced by all these efforts. We do not intended to unite ourselves with the joint military command under any conditions, nor do we intend to wait indefinitely while accepting pharisaic manifestations of interest which are linked with admissions of inability to take substantive action. Undoubtedly we do not intend to change the policy of linking this issue with the conclusion of an agreement on retaining the U.S. bases which would have no meaning if Greece were to stay outside the Alliance. Greece does not engage in blackmail or threats, and it also does not accept either being blackmailed or threatened by anyone.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL APPROVES GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

TA301412 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] The National Security Council convened at 1500 today under the chairmanship of General Evren, the head of state, president of the National Security Council and chief of the General Staff. The government program was debated and approved during the meeting. Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu then took the rostrum and thanked the National Security Council.

General Ersin Supports Program

TA301906 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] The National Security Council has discussed and adopted the program of the Bulent Ulusu government. The government has received a vote of confidence. The National Security Council met at parliament at 1500 under the chairmanship of Head of State Gen Denan Evren and discussed the government program. According to a statement made by the Press and Public Relations Bureau of the National Security Council Secretariat General, ground forces commander and National Security Council member Gen Nurettin Ersin expressed his views on the government program.

General Ersin said the government program diagnosed the country's most important problems and extraordinary conditions and proposed remedies with a realistic approach. Recalling that the government is not a party government, General Ersin noted that it is the desire of the whole nation to see this government succeed, a government composed of valuable citizens who want to serve the country. He added that conditions prevailing in the country and recent developments in the region increased the responsibility of the government and confronted it with a historic duty. He added: We are confident that the lofty Turkish nation will be in unity and solidarity and will support the state in overcoming this difficult period, as has been the case throughout history. The Turkish nation is willing to sacrifice. The Turkish nation has been able to see the danger through its peerless common sense and expects us to implement its wishes. Everything should be carried out in accordance with the nation's wishes and the measures pointed out in the program should be implemented speedily.

Noting that great care should be shown in carrying out services in a just, impartial and firm manner, General Ersin called for the eradication of bribery and discrimination which prepares the ground for anarchy within the state. Ersin then continued: The government program noted that the struggle against anarchy, terror and secessionism and economic difficulties are the most urgent problems in our country. Measures designed to overcome these difficulties were accurately determined. All these points cover the issues which we have dealt with. One of the most important reasons for the current unrest in Turkey is the economic crisis and chaos. The steadily increasing population, the insufficient level of production, the unjust distribution of national revenues and the mistakes in the wage policy are greatly disturbing our people. Measures should be rapidly taken to alleviate the economic difficulties of our people.

Amending tax laws to cover all economic activities, to ensure just taxation and to prevent a decrease in tax revenues will be a positive step. General Ersin noted that of all measures taken to ensure a healthy economy, those designed to increase production should be dealt with carefully. He added that it was most important to productively exploit national resources. He noted that it was necessary to secure the capital to activate these resources and to encourage frugality in a whole nation. General Ersin said necessary measures in this direction should be taken without delay and attention should be given to education and training in this field. Ersin continued: Promises of legal measures and arrangements to ensure that our citizens equally benefit from health services and that those employed in the agricultural sector benefit from social security schemes are in line with current needs and our people's wishes. The government program also includes bills which we believe are beneficial. All will be done to ensure that the draft bills are ratified as soon as possible.

Reaching the goals of this program, prepared in the light of the Ataturk principles, depends heavily on its successful implementation. It is important that the principles in the program be implemented rapidly and with precision in order to achieve results. General Ersin said that every effort should be exerted to realize the government program and that the country should achieve happiness and prosperity as desired by Ataturk. Noting that the circles of anarchy and terror which dare to stage treacherous attacks against the continuation of the state should be rapidly eliminated, General Ersin noted that the nation longed for tranquillity and prosperity.

Concluding his speech, Ersin said: We believe that this program reflects the wishes of the lofty Turkish nation and that it will introduce the solutions long desired. All our work will be carried out in front of the people. We hope that this program will be auspicious for our lofty nation and that the success of the Ulusu government will continue.

The government program was put to vote after General Ersin concluded his speech and was adopted without any changes. The government thus received a vote of confidence.

Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu took the rostrum after the voting. He thanked the Council for the confidence shown in his government and said that the views expressed will be borne in mind in the implementation of the program. Noting that the country was currently faced with two important problems which had to be solved, Ulusu noted that one of these problems was the struggle against anarchy, terror and secessionism and the other was the economic crisis. Ulusu said: Our primary goal is to safeguard the Ataturk reforms against all possible attacks through inspiration derived from the principles of the great leader. All necessary legal and administrative measures will be rapidly taken to defend the state, the Turkish Republic, against domestic and foreign enemies. Our primary goal is to enable the Turkish nation, sharing the same destiny, joy and grief, to attain the tranquillity and security it deserves. Noting that the government desired to establish a totally impartial administration which supported this state and served the nation, Ulusu added: All necessary measures to find good solutions to our economic problems, to increase production and to productively exploit our national resources will be taken as soon as possible. Legal and administrative measures will be rapidly taken to ensure a just taxation system and to prevent a decrease in tax revenues. Ulusu concluded by saying that the government will continue its work in order to enable the people to attain the tranquillity, prosperity and happiness it deserves.

EVREN DISCOURAGES ARMY POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT

TA3321549 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Excerpts] The 1980-1981 academic year began with a ceremony today at the Ground Forces War School. At the ceremony, the head of state, General Evren, gave an address.

He said: [Begin recording] My sons, at your age and in these times do not ever get involved in politics. If we have gotten involved in politics today, it is because we were obliged to, in order to save our nation, as always, from the terrible condition we were in. That was always our great leader Ataturk's directive to us. Whenever an army gets involved in politics, it slowly loses its discipline and begins to collapse. The clearest example in our recent history was in the Balkan War.

Consequently, to not ever take our current action as an example and get involved in politics. We were obliged to take this action within the framework of order and command in order to save the army from politics and to ensure that it was not smeared by the mud of politics. Had we not taken this action, as in previous cases, the army would have gotten involved in politics. Furthermore, as you realize, we are carrying this out with an order and command echelon of five persons. We are doing all we can to spare the lower echelons from becoming involved. We are also determined to return to our duties after placing our country on really democratic principles.

My colleagues, many people may approach you and try to inculcate you with various "ism" ideologies. We know this very well. If an "ism" ideology is to be inculcated it is the "Kemalism" ideology of our great leader Ataturk. You should adopt that ideology. The Kemalist principles have led us from darkness to light. The minute we moved away from Kemalism we began to fall into darkness. Whenever we moved away from it we were faced with disasters. We abandoned the great Ataturk who was taken as an example by the world and by the developing countries. We abandoned Ataturk who was our leader and we began to take as example the leaders of other countries.

My colleagues, the world is changing very fast, so much that wars have also changed. There are efforts to destroy countries from inside, by means of civil wars. If a country succeeds in turning the system of a second country into a system like its own, then the first country no longer needs to invade the second. That is what our enemies are trying to do. A Turkey whose population and power is increasing make several countries uneasy. That is what is happening. Today Turkey has a population of 45 million. In 10 years, it will be 60 million. A developed Turkey having a large population is always a source of concern for our enemies. So what do they do? They divide and swallow up the pieces. That is their policy.

My young colleagues, that is why you should close your ears and turn your backs on those who try to inculcate you with "ism" ideologies. Use your mind. You might think, at your age, that you know a lot. However, you will later realize that experience means much more than the information you receive. That is why you should believe in and trust in your experienced commanders, [end recording]

MINISTRY OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON COUNTRY'S OIL RESERVES

WC260848 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 25 Sep 80 pp 1, 12

[Excerpts] Ankara (ANKA)--Minister of Power and Natural Resources Serbulent Bingol has stated that Turkey has sufficient fuel to last 40 days and that this is the maximum amount Turkey can stock. The minister added: "We have learned that two of our tankers have safely sailed through the Hormuz Strait, carrying enough crude oil to meet Turkey's needs for 10 to 12 days." The minister of power and natural resources then stated that if the conflict between Iraq and Iran becomes protracted, not only Turkey but the entire world will be adversely affected. He added that at the moment the oil pipeline between Iraq and Turkey is flowing intermittently.

Bingol concluded by saying that the bombing of Abadan by the Iraqis, where the largest refineries of Iran are situated, will not affect Turkey because these installations do not produce processed oil. Turkey obtains crude oil from both sides.

PCI'S BERLINGUER CALLS FOR 'DEMOCRATIC UNITY' COALITION

AU301611 Rome ANSA in English 1605 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] Rome, 30 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer called for the creation of sweeping"Democratic Unity" coalition to deal with the nation's severe problems after meeting here today with chief-of-state Sandro Pertini.

Berlinguer, who was flanked by parliamentary floor leaders Edoardo Perna and Fernando di Giulio, told reporters that his delegation had voiced sharp concern for the gravit of the present situation at the meeting. "More than ever before," he said, "it is evident that a real innovative shift in political orientations and public morality is what is needed to deal with the situation."

When a reporter asked him if the downfall of the Cossiga government had changed anything for the PCI, Berlinguer replied:

"In any case, it seems to us to be a good thing that this government has fallen because it was a government that brought a lot of damage upon the country. The government's downfall has once more set in motion a political situation and opened the way for a better ruling arrangement. The best arrangement one which would truly respond to the gravity of the Italian situation, is a government of ample democratic unity, which includes the membership of the PCI. That is what we are insisting on."

BELGIUM'S NOTHOMB HAS 'FRANK, CORDIAL' TALKS WITH GROMYKO

LD011509 Brussels LE SOIR in French 28-29 Sep 80 p 3

["J. Pt." dispatch: "Nothomb Meets Gromyko Who Invites Him to Moscow"]

[Text] New York, 27 September--Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb, whose meeting with Mr Muskie was canceled, concluded his talks in New York with a talk with his Soviet counterpart Gromyko.

It was, our foreign minister said, "a frank and cordial talk."

The questions discussed included the Madrid conference which the two interlocutors want to succeed, and the European initiative in the Middle East with respect to which the Soviet minister complained to his Belgian colleague that the Nine had stopped halfway since they did not insist on the creation of a Palestinian state.

Mr Nothomb was invited to Moscow. He accepted this invitation but no date has yet been set.

At the end of this series of talks, the minister stated that the United Nations was an ideal venue for meeting a maximum of people in a minimum of time. He also stated that he was pleased that he had been able to convince his interlocutors, especially the American, of the correctness of the Belgian attitude toward Euromissiles.

NOTHOMB EXPLAINS BELGIAN POSITIONS ON EUROMISSILES

LD301535 Brussels LE SOIR in French 26 Sep 80 P 3

[Jean Pochet dispatch: "In Washington Mr Nothomb Has Defended His Ideas and Explained Those of Mr Van Miert"]

[Text] Washington, 25 September--Developments in the Iraqi-Iranian conflict prevented Mr Muskie from receiving Foreign Minister Nothomb as planned. However, a meeting will take place if the U.S. secretary of state's agenda leaves time for it.

We discussed with Mr Nothomb the communique issued on Friday about the conditions for deploying cruise missiles in Belgium--a communique whose version sent to the chancelleries differs from the tone of the official document.

With regard to the Geneva negotiations on the Euromissiles, the version intended for the Atlantic chancelleries states: "If this were not the case (if the negotiations were to prove unsuccessful--LE SOIR note) we would draw the necessary conclusions in solidarity with our allies." This is difficult to reconcil with the Mr Van Miert's viewpoint that there should be a "new discussion" within the Belgian Government even if the Geneva talks should fail.

"I have two or three things to say or to repeat on this subject. First, the government tried to establish a stance, and a consensus. Second, one U.S. worry was the impression that there was a tide of 'neutralism' in our country. I have denied that. Finally, the press keeps harping on Mr Van Miert's 'opinions.' I have personally defended to our U.S. interlocutors [apparent line drop] I was faced with the rather paradoxical situation of having to justify to U.S. officials, who are well-informed in one sense, of. Mr Van Miert's freedom, as Belgian Socialist Party president, to have ideas which are critical toward the government. I would like to add that I am prepared to discuss these ideas with Mr Van Miert when the time comes.

"However, to sum up, I think I have accomplished two tasks in Washington and New York: I defended the government's ideas because I sincerely believe in them and without having been asked to do so by Mr Van Miert I explained--I do not say defended--his ideas."

In our Wednesday edition we published an article by Mr Vanden Boeynants who stated in essence that he does not agree with Mr Van Miert. He also indirectly attacks Mr Martens by stating that "the conductor has chosen the wrong score."

To remain in the musical sphere, let us point out that a conductor must make sure that all the different instruments are in tune. On the other hand, as Mr Vanden Boeynants must know since he has done both jobs, a government chief has different interests from the leader of a political group.

At times it is more important for the government chief and his foreign minister to say and think the same things, which is the case in the missiles affair, evenif some members of the majority have expressed their opinions in different terms or in stronger terms.

LIBERAL LEADERS HIT GOVERNMENT INDECISION, INCONSISTENCY

LD301337 Brussels LE SOIR in French 26 Sep 80 p 2

[Unattributed report: "Flemish Liberals' Chief Willy de Clerq Wants Third Martens Team To Be "Restructured'"]

[Excerpt] After their talks on Wednesday afternoon the two Liberal Party presidents have stepped up their pressure on the government still further in two interviews. Party for Reform and Liberty [PRL] President Jean Gol, in an interview with the Liege newspaper LA MEUSE -LE LANTERNE, strongly criticized what he regards as the government's indecisive spirit. "Since the beginning of September," he said, "the government has given the impression of being unable to take a decision, of juggling with words, vacillating, reversing previous decisions at a time when decisiveness is vital since the crisis is growing worse." Party of Freedom and Progress [PVV] President Willy de Clerq, his Flemish counterpart, goes even further. In an interview granted to (Liberal) newspaper LAATSTE NIEUWS, he deplores the government's lack of management and constituency and blames the socialists and Christian democrats for this situation. "With the government as it is now," the Ghent leader said, "very little can be done: It must be restructured. Furthermore, if a new effort is not made and if real reforms are further delayed I will personally advocate the Liberals leaving the government at our assessment congress."

De Clerq also pointed out that he had suggested to Mr Martens that all the coalition party presidents should be summoned to a summit meeting with the prime minister to see if there is still a will to govern together. This idea seems bound to embarrass some parties like the Christian People's Party when you remember that Mr Tindemans, when he was prime minister, did not really like what was then described as the "president's junta."

The meeting which took place on Wednesday afternoon lasted 2 hours. The prime minister did not express any official reaction. "He listened to the two presidents," his office indicated.

"The prime minister now knows what our viewpoint is and will consult the government about it," Mr Gol said after the meeting before reiterating his party's demands.

Mr Clerq specified that the PRL and PVV have parallel if not similar attitudes on economic, financial and budgetary matters. "We did not take the risk of joining the government only to leave it a few weeks later, nor did we intend to do nothing." "We are in the government to help it solve the crisis and to get as much of our program passed as possible. We have already obtained a reduction in tax pressure and now want to obtain a real reform in public spending," he added.

At noon, after his party bureau's meeting, Mr God has stated more bluntly that if the PRL's proposals were not taken into account more, the French-speaking Liberals' congress scheduled for 18 October might draw its own conclusions.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORTS UN CALL FOR MIDEAST CEASE-FIRE

LD011520 Hamburg DPA in German 1331 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, (DPA)--The Federal Government supports the UN Security Council's call for an immediate cease-fire in the war between Iran and Iraq and for a peaceful settlement of the conflict. This was stated by Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling in Bonn today following a cabinet session in which State Secretary Guenther van Well of the Foreign Ministry reported at length on the current situation in the war zone.

Boelling said the Federal Government expects a peaceful settlement of the conflict to be found soon. "We are doing all we can in the political and diplomatic spheres to this end." In addition the government spokesman said that Bonn is calling on the parties involved to show a receptive attitude to the current mediation efforts, especially to the Islamic Conference organization. The Federal Government adheres to the principle of noninterference and neutrality and in this is in full accord with its allies. Bonn calls on all other states to avoid an escalation and widening of the conflict by exercising extreme restraint.

The Federal Government expects the freedom of international shipping, in which the international community has a vital interest, to be respected. According to Boelling, the Federal Republic's oil supply is secure for the time being. The oil stocks are sufficient for more than 120 days. Together with its partners Bonn will do everything necessary to ensure that temporary reductions in deliveries are made good in other ways.

APEL ON CONSULTATIONS WITH U.S. ON PROTECTING OIL SUPPLIES

LD021026 Hamburg DPA in German 0927 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 2 Oct (DPA)--Federal Defense Minister Apel is convinced that diplomatic efforts will succeed in keeping open the Strait of Hormuz and the shipping lanes in the region. In an interview with WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU, Apel again confirmed that a military role for the Federal Republic in the crisis area is "completely out of the question." Bonn is having talks with Washington on protecting oil supplies but not on the deployment of German warships outside the NATO area.

A general debate is being held within NATO with a view to lessening the burden on the United States in central Europe. "If positive answers to this are requested they must be given by all Western Europeans." Under no circumstances can Germany "fill gaps opened by the United States."

FDP'S MOELLEMANN FAVORS UN PEACEKEEPING FORCE FOR HORMUZ

LD010030 Hamburg DPA in German 1235 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 30 Sep (DPA)--FDP defense expert Juergen Moellemann has spoken out in favor of the deployment of a UN naval peacekeeping force in the Strait of Hormuz. He said in Bonn today that President Carter's ideas about possibly sending a NATO naval squadron were "extremely problematical and not without danger." A squadron of this sort would spread the conflict further. Moellemann again stressed that there could be no question of sending Bundeswehr units to the Gulf.

SPD'S WEHNER URGES U.S. TO RATIFY SALT II

LD301306 Hamburg DPA in German 1107 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] Bonn, 30 Sep (DPA)--SPD Bundestag leader Herbert Wehner has urged the ratification of the American-Soviet SALT II treaty by the United States as a condition for new East-West disarmament negotiations.

In a Radio Bremen interview published today, Wehner said that if SALT II were now finally ratified by the United States, too, it would be possible to start on a third SALT agreement in which binding agreements between the superpowers and their allies on European medium-range weapons could at last be reached. Wehner made it plain that he does not expect progress in this direction before the American presidential election in November, which he called a "decisive date." The German side, too, has to make an effort so that after the election there is less mutual recrimination between the superpowers and also among their allies, and more accomodation regarding a SALT III treaty.

Wehner said that the NATO rearmament decision with regard to medium-range missiles has certainly made the efforts for disarmament more difficult, pointing at the same time, however, to NATO's offer of immediate negotiations that was coupled with it. He accused the Soviet Union of not yet responding to this offer, but following Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's talks in Moscow and the beginning of talks between other statesmen, the commencement of talks cannot be ruled out. A year has been wasted on this question by the West, but not by the Germans, however, who urged the two superpowers to enter into negotiations.

Wehner repeated his criticism that the Western side is not really responding to the East's proposals in the Vienna force reduction talks. Unfortunately the Vienna talks are merely marking time. In Wehner's view the SALT III negotiations could "also finally provide a framework for seriousness of purpose in the Vienna troop reduction talks."

SPD REAFFIRMS SUPPORT FOR EC MEMBERSHIP

LD011820 Hamburg DPA in German 1719 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 1 Oct (DPA)--Under the chairmanship of Chancellor Schmidt, the SPD Presidium has discussed the demand made by the new majority in the British Labor Party that Britain should leave the European Community. The spokesman of the SPD Executive, Lothar Schwartz, said today that the SPD Presidium had noted that apart from the Labor Party, all social democratic parties in the European Community were agreed that the Community is indispensable and should be developed. The SPD saw no reason to change this policy which it had strongly supported for a long time.

SPOKESMAN DENIES STRAUSS MADE REMARKS CRITICAL OF MUSKIE

LD020050 Hamburg DPA in German 2203 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] Hans Dross, spokesman of the Bavarian government, has denied a GUARDIAN report that Strauss had made very critical remarks about U.S. Secretary of State Muskie. Dross, who claims he was present during Strauss's talk with British journalists in [place name indistinct] on Monday night, told DPA in Essen tonight that Strauss merely said something to the effect that the Americans had not always been very adroit in the past. He had meant in particular American reactions to Moscow's expansion in Africa. These events are no longer topical.

DER SPIEGEL PUBLISHES DISPUTED CSU POSITION PAPER

DW020830 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 29 Sep 80 pp 20-22

[Text] The position paper is 13 typewritten pages long. It carries the headline: "Reflection of Kreuth--About the CSU Strategy After 5 October." The paper contains the advice to dissolve the CDU/CSU faction after an election defeat and to establish anew the CSU as a fourth party in the entire Federal Republic. DER SPIEGEL received the document from a CSU man with the remark that it came from the office of CSU Secretary General Edmund Stoiber. The latter stated, however, that neither he nor the CSU had worked out such a paper; if such a paper existed, it must be a "forgery due to election-tactical reasons."

Based on that statement, he demanded from the DER SPIEGEL publishing house that DER SPIEGEL should not claim that "the CSU has such a document worked out by Dr Stoiber." He further demanded that excerpts "from the alleged position paper of the CSU and Dr Stoiber" should not be published. Trusting the truth of Stoiber's statement, the DER SPIEGEL publishing house has given the demanded assurance, which does not mean, however, that DER SPIEGEL would "publish no excerpts from the position paper," as the CSU press office wrongly interpreted. The CSU recognized that shortcoming. It demanded shortly thereafter a second DER SPIEGEL publishing house assurance not to report on "CSU plans to dissolve the faction" and to create a fourth party in case of a defeat. DER SPIEGEL did not make that statement.

It has been established in the meantime that the paper is neither a "forgery" (Stoiber) nor a "falsification" (Zimmermann), but a worked-over version of CSU position papers from the spring of 1979 completed in the summer of 1980. The original texts were presented by Stoiber to his CDU colleague Geissler at a meeting of the Union's secretaries general at Seiser Alm. Two newspapers hinting at that fact were not asked by the CDU to abstain from publishing. FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU wrote: "The paper obviously stems from the time prior to the summer pause when the Union expereinced a clear low in its mood. In this mood the paper about separation plans was composed." SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG noted in a commentary under the headline "The Faction Treaty Seems in a Hurry": The paper is "certainly not a falsification, as Friedrich Zimmermann said. It is most likely a somewhat more up-to-date CSU version, whose original text was known to the sister party for a long time." DER SPIEGEL feels it has been incorrectly informed by the CSU secretary general. It therefore does not feel bound by its assurance any more. The CSU position paper--it is not a plan but certainly a hypothesis--reads as follows:

1. The political aim of the Union for the 1980 Bundestag elections has been clearly outlined by the common election program and the directives contained in the speeches given by Franz Josef Strauss at the CDU and CSU congresses in early summer. Involved is a change of German policy, historic setting of the switch. The significance of the forthcoming elections can be compared only with that of the August 1949 elections.

A CDU/CSU election victory would eventually bring about the turn that was long overdue. It would correct the wrong policy of the past 10 years. It would prevent the coming about of the socialist society of the future aimed for by the SPD, and it would make an end to the gradual capitulation to Moscow.

Preservation of our democratic Constitutional system, firm anchoring of the Federal Republic of Germany in the Western alliance on the side of the United States--under a federal chancellor named Strauss these basic elements of our existence in freedom and our future would be guaranteed.

What must be done in order to achieve a majority in the Bundestag on 5 October has been thoroughly outlined at the CSU congress. No cuts will be made in this respect.

2. A policy worth its name must not be blinkered. It must soberly take into consideration negative developments as well. The mistake of 1976 must not be repeated when we stood there the day after the elections without a concept, because our wishes and hopes were not fulfilled and because the Union was lacking 400,000 votes to win.

Even if the worst happened and we fail again to achieve our aim in October, the Union will not be dispensed of its historic responsibility. But not much would be won if it just continued to play its role as the opposition. The consequences would have to be much more thorough. This is the main issue.

3. It does not imply extreme caution or pessimism if one assesses the chances of the Union with restraint a few months prior to the elections. The following handicapping factors carry particular weight:

The leftist coalition of Bonn has lived through the Afghanistan crisis without suffering any visible damage. Its appeasement policy vis-a-vis Moscow is considered by many federal citizens not as endangering German and Western security interests but as an attempt to safeguard peace. One does not see through Schmidt's role as a trickster [gauklerrolle] called "peace chancellor." The Chamberlain tragedy of 1938 seems to be repeated, but this time in German. The leftist media have contributed considerably to this lulling into sleep policy which was linked with an unprecedented liberal-socialist mudslinging campaign against Strauss. Television and radio are deteriorating more and more into becoming tools and the state radio system of the SPD. The equalization of opinion there reminds one of the the times of the Reich and its radio system.

The present economic situation gives the government an advantage. No acute convulsions have taken place, and most voters fail to realize creeping dangers.

As was mooted, the DGB once more is acting as an election helper of the SPD. The warnings uttered in 1979 have fully materialized.

In Freiburg in June 1980 the FDP chained itself for 4 more years to the SPD. It is ruled out as a coalition partner of the Union because neither Josef Ertl nor Graf Lambsdorff are able to stop the leftist course of their party and shift the helm.

The CDU is lacking unswerving courage and determination with regard to confrontation with the political opponent. Too many look too frequently forward to the year 1984 and Albrecht, their desired candidate.

As regards the first point, it is hardly possible to achieve a thorough psychological change in a short time. As regards the other points, we have even less of an opportunity to bring influence to bear on them. In order to change the scene, we would have to apply the lever to the latter points in case of a failure on 5 October.

In both cases problems of the political structure are involved and of the political situation on which the CSU can bring extraordinary influence to bear. As a prerequisite one must view without any illusion the shape in which the CDU and the FDP are.

4. In order to successfully resist the deceitful spirit of the age [zeitgeist] fed by the Moscow faction of the SPD, which wants and accepts quiet at any price, and to explain to the voter the fateful significance of the 1980 Bundestag elections, the Union parties should have activated all their forces. The CSU cannot be reproached in this regard. But as regards the CDU, we have experienced that it is fighting in many places with just half its strength or that it is just engaged in mock fights.

Franz Josef Strauss, the common top candidate, was not given the solidarity by the "northern lights," the solidarity he would have needed and he could have demanded. Whenever we blocked the SPD and its auxiliary troops in the DGB and among the intellectuals the CDU withdrew. The same pussyfooting could be observed with regard to Ostpolitik and German policy. Speeches (such as by Weizaecker on 17 June in the Bundestag) or remarks (such as by Keip in the United States about Schmidt's recent Moscow visit) had to create doubts in the public.

This repeatedly stated distance with regard to the CSU and its chairman was manifested strikingly by the lack of readiness to join the Strauss election campaign team. Stoltenberg agreed only after lengthy hesitation; others abstained completely. With a view to 1984 one has its own political career too much in mind, and not merely in Hannover.

The CDU was completely out of step after the defeat at the Saar and the disaster in North-Rhine Westphalia. Many people thought only along one line, spreading the talk about the Strauss effect, thus pouring grist on the mill of the SPD.

Instead of seeing their own mistakes and the miserable election campaign, Strauss was made the scapegoat.

The shock of the election defeat in North-Rhine Westphalia paralyzed the local CDU and other land associations. The defeat was caused by petty political decisions. Pettiness and panic were gaining ground. Schmidt was considered the superman against whom one could not do anything. The failure of significant parts of the CDU was complete.

If no victory should be achieved on 5 October, it will be not least because of that wavering. Those considering the matter as lost cannot create enthusiasm among the voters. They only will make them feel uncertain.

5. It was correct to attempt to separate the FDP from the SPD, but it was wrong to rely only on this, as one can continually see with regard to Kiep and other CDU politicians. The chances to change fronts were always extremely small. They will not increase after the 1980 Freiburg decisions. We must reckon with the FDP remaining a volutary prisoner of the socialists.

So the intolerable situation will continue after 5 October that a party with somewhat more than 5 percent of the votes will decide on who will rule over Germany. We cannot permanently accept the FDP playing the role of a referee of German policy, of a fate maker. An end must be made to that eventually.

A party blocking the functioning of democracy, the change between the government and the opposition, must be eliminated from the field of the parties, at least as much as not to play the balance of the scale any more.

6. The CSU will not passively and full of self-pity accept a negative outcome of the elections on 5 October. Franz Josef Strauss has issued the only right slogan in that event: No withdrawal to the province.

We will not settle down comfortably in the safe stronghold of Bavaria. We will continue to live up in an uncurtailed way to our German and European responsibility, but in doing this we will have to give some thought to the framework of our policy. I am certain that it must be extended. It is necessary to recall Kreuth, the basic idea we have formulated at that time: March separately, fight together. The CDU leadership must be supported in believing that the faction community will be preserved. We will not withdraw in 1980 as in 1976. The CDU will be grateful for this later on.

A dissolution of the faction community with the CDU and the creation of a fourth party in the form of a Federal Republic-wide CSU or in some other adequate form, would end the inflexibility of the setup of German parties and change it in the following necessary direction:

The policy of Franz Josef Strauss would be eventually presented to the voter in a genuine way. We would not need an interpreter north of the Main who would water down or ignore significant statements. The modern conservative element would have its firm position in the structure of parties. In view of the challenges of Soviet communism and the SPD's tending toward a people's front German policy of the late 20th century needs such a counterbalance more urgently than ever.

It is obvious that this party would be attractive to many CDU voters. As we know, the slash does not run between the CSU and the CDU when the political course and its implementation are involved, it runs plainly through the CDU. The federal election campaign has clearly demonstrated this again.

The CDU with the strong substance it would then have could occupy fields which today belong to the FDP's reservoir of voters. Political ideas, such as those of Ernst Albrecht or Secretary General Geissler, which create unnecessary friction in the present Union, could fully develop and be significantly useful.

The days of the FDP as a factor in federal policy would be numbered. It would hardly have a chance of survival against a CDU with a liberal profile.

The SPD would eventually cease being in power. It would unavoidably suffer a deep internal crisis and it would have to forget for the rest of the century about its socialist changes of society. It might possibly even break apart into doctrinarian-Marxist experiments would have been banned together with the threatening Finlandization of the Federal Republic.

It is hard to predict whether the creation of a fourth party and the planned new party system without the FDP will constitute a final state of affairs, or whether eventually a two-party system with a conservative-liberal and a socialist camp will come about; that must be left to the future.

8. Such considerations in connection with the concepts of Franz Josef Strauss and the known Kreuth decisions are not mere toying with ideas. Pertinent decisions may have to be made in 1980. If we do not score a victory on 5 October, they will become an unavoidable necessity.

We must therefore not have endless debates with the CDU as in the past; we must much rather react quickly and offensively. We cannot afford a second time to be confused and undecided as in 1976. The time factor is of great importance. We must create faits accomplis as long as the ground is emotionally prepared for it, but also for other reasons:

In the event of a defeat, many CDU people will hold us responsible and consider the candidacy of Franz Josef Strauss as the root of the defeat. We must defend ourselves against that. That result would be a debate about guilt which would be detrimental to the CSU.

One would try to "get rid" of Franz Josef Strauss, and move him to Bavaria, so to speak. The greatest German political force since Konrad Adenauer must be fully active also in the future; we need it particularly in the critical eighties.

One will not hesitate to speak of 1984 and to present Ernst Albrecht to us as the man of the future. That is absolutely unacceptable for the CSU, unless we want to repudiate ourselves.

As after 1976 one will again wait for the FDP miracle and for this party's freeing itself from the embrace of the SPD. Making this the axis of our policy would mean condemning the Union to inactivity. We will not expose ourselves to Genscher's mercy or lack thereof. Under the pretext of preserving the unity of the Union and of distributing the weight in it in a new, just and more effective way, one would try to weaken the position of the CSU.

Aside from the fact that we would never permit the latter, the answer can only be: Unity is not a value in itself, and freedom is more than unity. A faction unity does not automatically guarantee solidarity (something Franz Josef Strauss unfortunately must experience in the present election campaign). Separation is always better than a dubious compromise which in the end will achieve nothing. Only results count in politics and nothing else.

9. Nobody can charge us with party egotism or lack of patience. Despite reservations the CSU has revoked its 1976 Kreuth decision in order to dare make a last attempt in the old battle formation. But if the attempt of 1980 will not show the desired result, Kreuth must be thought through to the end and then one must act accordingly.

We ought to make preparations so that the necessary scenario will be set up without loss of time. Without wanting to determine the sequence of individual steps, the following should be done:

Termination or no prolongation of the faction community with the CDU in the Bundestag. The Kreuth experience shows that no difficulties would exist in this respect in the CSU land group.

A conference of CSU function and mandate bearers should take place, that is the group of persons Franz Josef Strauss and Friedrich Zimmerman addressed in 1976 with their common letter. Explanation of the necessary decisions with the aim to set up a fourth Federal Republic-wide party.

Caling a special CSU congress to approve these steps and to make appropriate changes of the statutes.

Programmatically outlining our policy for the eighties with a clear difference to the CDU without denying common aspects and attitudes. A first draft ought to be ready by October.

The possible establishment of a CDU land association in Bavaria must not be alarming. Our basis of voters is strong enough to stand that. It must be safeguarded from the very beginning that after the 1982 Landtag elections a CSU/CSU coalition government should rule in Munich. We ought to make commitments in this respect in order to set a signal all over the Federal Republic for the future relations between both parties.

10. A basic change of the setup of German parties will naturally not be free of risks. Once it got going, it could produce superfluous splinter groups. But the risk would be much greater if we left, due to our stiking with an unsuccessful CDU/CSU formation, the Federal Republic of Germany to the SPC for another 4 years or 8 years or even longer.

In the end there would be an SPD state, collective internally and neutralistic externally, thus being closer to Moscow than the free West. The historic heritage of Konrad Adenauer is already in danger of being lost. Later on the damage could be irreparable. We would just have the sad task of crying over lost chances.

Those who are worried that the CSU could suffer from separating itself from the current relations with the CDU could suffer from separating over the Federal Republic should keep in mind our strong points. We will name just the three most important ones:

First, we have the politically most united and determined party in Germany with a strong potential of permanent voters in Bavaria and many sympathizers outside its borders.

Second, we have many friends in the CDU, up to the presidium of the party. They could certainly follow our call, because an unsuccessful outcome of the 5 October elections would not permit any hesitation as in 1976 after Kreuth.

Third, in the person of Franz Josef Strauss we have a politician of a rare nature who in all the time of his political activity has pursued a policy without ifs and whens and with clear contours. History does not always have such a man ready, not even for the CSU.

Regardless of the outcome of the 5 October 1980 elections, the historical mission will remain to bring about a change and restoration of German policy. The CSU must face this, either as the party of the chancellor or as a fourth party in a completely changed political setup. It is a commandment of political reason for us to prepare for the second case in time.

GISCARD STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF FREE SHIPPING IN GULF

LD011324 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Excerpt] France is asking Iraq and Iran to respond to the UN Security Council's call to put an end to their war. As you know, Iraq has already replied positively to this call. The request was made at this morning's Council of Ministers meeting during which Valery Giscard d'Estaing recalled France's deep anxiety over the extent of the destruction already caused and the continuation of a conflict which is disturbing the equilibrium of the region. Once again the president of the republic stressed the importance of the maintenance of the free movement of shipping in the Gulf and the Straits of Hormuz for the world economy.

BARRE CLARIFIES REMARKS ON IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT

LD021035 Paris LE MONDE in French 2 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] At his press conference in Vienna on 26 September Mr Raymond Barre did not make the remarks attributed to him by the Baghdad OBSERVER which reports that the French Premier said that "the defensive measures taken by Iraq are aimed at recovering the territories usurped by Iran." Before stressing that "the question of French arms sales to Iraq is a limited question" and that Paris has always had "trusting political relations" with Baghdad, Mr Barre had merely indicated: "According to information we have, it seems that the action taken by Iraq is aimed at winning back a number of territories which Iraq had handed over to Iran during the 1975 settlement. Therefore the conflict is, so to speak, limited and French diplomacy is working to achieve a political settlement as quickly as possible. The essential thing is to safeguard freedom of passage through the Straits of Hormuz."

GABON'S BONGO PROMISES ASSISTANCE IN OIL CRISIS

AB011256 Paris AFP in French 0934 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 1 Oct (AFP)--President Omar Bongo, who is on an official visit to Paris, stated on Wednesday morning that France could count on Gabonese assistance in the present oil crisis. (Experts predict that in 1980 Gabon will produce 9 million tons of oil, of which 2 million will be bought by France. The Gabonese head of state, who was interviewed by Europe No 1, recalled that in bad times Gabon had always found France ready to help, so it was absolutely normal for his country to help France in its turn in any possible way.

Mr Omar Bongo affirmed tha he had not come to Paris to ask for anything, but to strengthen the update Franco-Gabonese cooperation. France's guest, who considers President Giscard d'Estaing his equal as they are both presidents of republics, stressed that the present head of state has been his personal friend since 1963. Finally, the Gabonese president placed much emphasis on the fact that France's internal politics are not his concern. The left, the center, the right do not count for me, he said. Only France counts for me.

BARRE, AUSTRIA'S KREISKY PREPARED TO AID POLISH ECONOMY

LD011003 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Sep 80 p 10

[Alain Rollat dispatch: "Barre and Kreisky Say They Are Prepared To Give Poland Economic Aid"]

[Text] Vienna--When Mr Barre makes official visits abroad he does not allow people to accuse him of aspiring to be a traveling salesman. For instance, the day before his arrival in Vienna he said in an interview broadcast by Austrian radio and television: "My visit is not a commercial visit. I am going to have a general exchange of views with Chancellor Kreisky on international questions and on our bilateral relations. We will of course examine a number of specific projects...but my visit will be more of a meeting between the heads of two European governments which are close to each other."

The first speeches which were exchanged on Wednesday evening confirmed that the premier and the chancellor want above all to have detailed diplomatic talks between France and Austria on East-West relations, Middle East conflicts and cooperation between the industrialized nations and the developing countries. Mr Kreisky advocated increased cooperation between EEC countries and the neutral European countries. As far as the immediate future is concerned he expressed the hope that the international situation will not prevent the Madrid CSCE from taking place but the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan clearly makes him rather pessimistic.

On the other hand, he gave a positive verdict on the situation in Poland. Austria does not dare contemplate the possibility that the USSR might carry out a military intervention to "normalize" Poland. What credibility could the policy of dialogue so dear to Mr Kreisky then have? Expressing his stance in a very balanced way Mr Kreisky indicated: "Events in Afghanistan constitute a serious obstacle to the detente policy but there are also the events in Poland, and the reason why promises have been made to the Polish workers is that the Helsinki spirit has survived." The chancellor added: "All democratic countries are obliged to help Poland. We must, as far as possible, create the economic conditions which will enable the Polish Government to keep the material promises it has made to the workers."

In his reply the premier told Mr Kreisky that France "fully supports" Austria's efforts to promote detente. He expressed approval of the chancellor's thoughts on events in Poland: "We sincerely hope that Poland will be able to settle its internal problems in full independence and sovereignty and, for our part, we are prepared to give it the aid which could enable it to tackle its problems in the difficult period it is experiencing." Although the two government chiefs have given bilateral relations second place after their main concerns, they will not be disregarded. They will be discussed in separate talks between [Environment Minister] d'Ornano and [Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs] Stirn and their Austrian counterparts. Asked to assess France's chances of winning an Austrian order for 24 Mirage-50 aircraft despite U.S. competition Mr Barre replied with a proverb: "Don't count your chickens before they are hatched." The premier was prepared to say a little more in paying tribute to the Austrian economy, stressing that "Austria offers the rare sight of calm prosperity and social consensus which is probably the prerogative or characteristic of happy peoples." According to official statistics, Austria does not suffer from galloping inflation, unemployment is virtually nonexistent and, in 1979, there were in all only 6,111 hours of strikes and 786 people on strike, in other words 7.9 seconds spent on strike per employee, enough to make Mr Barre think!

PERTINI HOLDS CONSULTATIONS ON GOVERNMENT CRISIS

AU010851 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Rome, 1 Oct (ANSA)--Italian Head of State Sandro Pertini is expected to tap a prime minister designate today in his ongoing bid to cut short the nation's second government crisis this year. The head of state wound up his second round of consultations in the afternoon yesterday after meeting with the secretaries of the parties represented in the Rome Parliament.

Going into and coming out of the talks with the president, the positions of the parties, as voiced by their secretaries, underwent no measurable changes.

In summary, the Christian Democrats reconfirmed the importance they attribute to close working ties with the Socialist and Republican Parties.

The Communists once again pressed their request for the formation of a broadly-based democratic government to include the Communist Party.

The Socialists called for the creation of a political framework which includes ample guarantees for their direct participation and the small Social Democratic Party emphasized the urgency of opening constructive relations with the Communists and new cooperative relations between their own party and the Socialists.

The neofascist MSI came up with no indications for a government formula but assigned to their party "the merit of having toppled the Cossiga government".

The Republicans reaffirmed the significance of cooperation between their party and the Socialists.

The Radicals reiterated their position that, "the inability to govern the country is rooted in the parties of the regime; the Christian Democrats want to stay on as the ruling party and the Communists are aiming to dismantle things".

The Liberals are calling for a broader majority for the next government, one which would enjoy cooperative relations with the opposition.

In party quarters, in the meantime, the Social Democrats were the first off the mark with their leadership meeting yesterday. The PSDI statement endorsed by the leadership affirmed that the party wants to contribute "to the solution of the government through the creation of a majority and government which will gather all the nation's democratic forces for seeking out new constructive relations, in the forms which are feasible, with the Communist Party".

The leadership of the Republican party and the Socialists' leaders are slated to go into session today.

The Christian Democrat Senate group met yesterday and named as candidates for the post of prime minister designate DC Party Chairman Arnaldo Forlani and Secretary Flaminio Piccoli.

One fixed point of reference for the crisis came yesterday when reports that the outgoing prime minister would refuse another job from the president were confirmed. Pertini, in response to newsmen's questions on his thoughts for a new head of government, merely said, "we'll see", and kept his own counsel.

Summons Forlani for Conference

[Text] President of the Republic Pertini, has summoned Arnaldo Forlani, member of Parliament and DC party chairman, to appear at the Presidential Palace at 1000 on 2 October. Forlani has been considered the most likely candidate to solve the government crisis and to form a new government team.

SOCIALIST PARTY'S CRAXI, 'ENTIRE LEADERSHIP' RESIGN

AU011610 Rome ANSA in English 1600 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 1 Oct (ANSA)--Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi's announcement of his intention to resign his job, along with the entire Socialist leadership, came today as an added fillip for Head of State Sandro Pertini who is expected to name a premier-designate tomorrow to replace Premier Francesco Cossiga.

In the wake of the unexpected development, reported from Socialist Party headquarters during a leadership meeting, political observers began speculating on the reasons behind Craxi's decision in this time of deep political and economic crisis. According to these analyses, the decision is geared to the political and government crisis and the requirement to put off the party's national congress, originally slated for December.

BERLINGUER VIEWS FALL OF GOVERNMENT, FUTURE PCI ROLE

LD011537 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 29 Sep 80 pp 1-2

[Giorgio Frasca Polara report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 28 September speech at L'UNITA festival in Catania: "Lesson of Cossiga's Downfall"]

[Excerpts] Catania--The two important successes of the past few hours--the fall of the Cossiga-II government and the suspension of the Fiat layoffs--were at the center of Enrico Berlinguer's speech last night in Catania at the end of the L'UNITA festival there, which gave an opportunity to tens and tens of thousands of Sicilians to take a leading role in a committed political rally that was awaited particularly eagerly following the rapid developments in the country's most important affairs.

These successes, Berlinguer said, show how right the line pursued by the Communists was and still is and how the battle that they waged so vigorously and steadfastly from opposition, in close contact with the masses, has rendered a service to the workers and the country. It has been a harsh but constructive battle which, while it has swept away a damaging government, has also set in motion important forces hitherto shackled by the logic of the tripartite government.

Berlinguer discussed the issue of the government's fall, the reasons for it and future prospects. Let us first, the PCI secretary general said, clear away the "sighs, tears and lamentations" of some representatives of the outgoing government parties and some journalists with regard to the "snipers". It is true that the government was placed in a minority because a certain number--30 or perhaps more--of deputies belonging to the parties supporting it voted with the opposition in the secret ballot, thus causing the rejection of the economic decree that the government had stubbornly been trying to impose on parliament for months.

The secret ballot is a long-established principle in all democratic systems in defense of free voting and against any attempt to exert pressure or coercion.

Instead of hollering and mounting witch hunts, the leaders of the tripartite government would therefore do well to reflect more calmly on the political significance of the action taken by 30 parliamentarians of their precarious and disunited majority. If they did so they would have to agree on the following two facts: First, that the vote reflected a rebellion against a repeated abuse whereby an attempt has been made to stifle any chance of discussion or of reaching a free decision on the amendments to the decree presented not only by the opposition but also by deputies of the majority itself; and second, that the vote was more generally a reflection of the unease that has been smoldering and rising to the surface for some time even within the majority parties in connection with the methods used by a more and more discredited, indecisive and harmful government.

Furthermore, in the past few days the government had become so worn down that the DC, PSI and PRI leaders were afraid that the slightest opportunity for dialogue or a vote in parliament might place the government in a minority. Someone even went as far as to formulate the theory that all the government (and the country) needed to do was to stay afloat and that the government had to survive at all costs, proceeding by dint of decree-laws and votes of confidence. Everything should be decided by a four-man leadership composed of Cossiga, Piccoli, Craxi and Spadolini. All parliament would have to do would be ratify their decisions. And so parliament ground to a halt, paralysis. Just consider that the vote of confidence called for on the maxi-decree excluded any possibility of discussion or of passing any amendments—not only our own but also the ones put forward by Christian Democrats, Socialists and Republicans.

This, the party secretary general pointed out, was the situation after we had been bombarded for weeks and months with offers and hints of resuming a "positive dialogue" with the PCI! Apart from so many tortuous and vacuous words, a form of conduct was becoming established which prevented parliament and the institutions from functioning. This conduct is the result of extreme arrogance and at the same time extreme weakness—a combination which leads, to call things by their proper name, to adventurism, which is the line of action most dangerous to democracy.

Now everyone is bound to admit that this government's downfall is a success for our party. And so it is. But Berlinguer was keen to fully investigate the significance of this undoubted success on our part. Its significance, he said, is of a battle waged not for partisan interest but for the country; a battle that has done Italy a service, because it has cleared away a government that was causing the situation to decay, exacerbating social and political tensions and hindering any positive development in them.

So we did well to perform our opposition to this government to the full. It is not true that we were and still are trying for the worst: We are trying for the best, namely a constructive and responsible effort to restore Italy's moral and political health. And in any case the fact that our work was and still is constructive is shown by the proposals we have formulated and fought for in all fields and all forums—from the anti-terrorist struggle to foreign policy and the proposals for making the economic and fiscal measures envisaged by the decrees more effective and equitable.

But—and this was another essential issue raised by Berlinguer—what lessons will the other parties learn from this past year and especially from the fall of the Cossiga Government? Will they be a little less arrogant and a little less short-sighted? Will they understand that the tripartite government's vicissitudes and crisis were the result not of a "conspiracy" but of the country's serious situation and that above all they signify the following: The complete inadequacy of a policy which aims to extricate Italy from the crisis—which implies its thorough regeneration—without and against the PCI? We do not know. As far as we are concerned, our directorate will decide on our conduct during the crisis that has just begun.

Berlinguer was keen to recall some of the points he made in his speech in Bologna a fortnight ago, when he tried to answer the question: What kind of government if Cossiga falls? It should be clear to all, he said first, that only one solution is truly equal to the gravity of the domestic and international situation, to the country's needs and to the aspirations of our society's most vigorous and active forces--a government of which the PCI is a fully member.

If the other parties also put forward this solution to the government crisis, the communists will assess it with an open but at the same time vigilant mind, with an awareness of their responsibilities and of the specific role which, as always, the PCI must fulfill.

If, however, the other parties still persist in ruling out the PCI's participation in government, then clearly, as we have often said, we will continue in opposition, standing firm on our exclusion of any form of outside support. This does not mean that the Communists will be indifferent during the crisis to the various solutions that might emerge. Clearly, Berlinguer stressed, we will do our utmost to ensure that the country is given a government which, though we still consider it inadequate, will at least be more responsible and open-minded than the previous one.

As for the nature of our opposition, it could take different forms from the ones we have followed hitherto; but this will depend primarily on the government's structure and composition: That is, whether or not it reflects the usual distribution of portfolios purely on the basis of factions. Apart from the government issue there is the issue of the state administration, that is, the issue of how the public bodies and institutions, including the banks, are to be governed and run, and of who will be appointed to head them. Here, the PCI secretary general said, we are asking for just one thing, in accordance with the country's unanimous demand: Morality and professional competence.

Second, the nature of the PCI's opposition will depend on the government's general political approach, on its program and above all on its specific actions in the field of economic and social policy (especially with regard to Southern Italy); in foreign policy and in the struggle against terrorism, the Mafia and organized crime; and in the field of the functioning and efficiency of the democratic institutions and all state bodies.

Therefore, the PCI secretary general said, concluding this part of his speech, it is not on fine words but on the substance of the program and on specific conduct in this field (as well as on what solutions will be given to the pressing problem of the regions in which administrations have not yet been formed) that we will assess the real degree of open-mindedness and attention to the demands and proposals which we communists represent.

Every time the PSI yields to the CD it strengthens the latter's growing abuse of power. The path we are pointing to will help bring a reaction from the secular and Catholic forces, including Christian Democratic forces, which are now prisoners of the DC's swing to the right and give them courage and a more incisive role. It is up to us to combine our critique, even severe, of the backtracking committed and ground yielded by the PSI with a quest for unitary links with the socialist comrades and other leftwing and democratic forces and to facilitate the prospects of a political turning point in this region [Sicily].

The last part of the speech was devoted to the serious international situation with special reference to the Iranian-Iraqi war and the consequent threats to world peace. Berlinguer stressed the need for a strong and broad mobilization of all popular forces.

DENMARK

SOCIALIST PARTY SEES ATTEMPT TO ALTER SECURITY POLICY

LD300941 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 25 Sep 80 p 17

[Unattributed report: "Socialist People's Party Fears for Our Security"]

[Text] The whole discussion on the size of the budget in a new defense settlement in the opinion of the Socialist People's Party is nothing in comparison with what is described as an attempt by the government to implement "the most far-reaching and most dangerous change in Danish security policy."

According to Socialist People's Party Chairman Gert Petersen the government is trying to establish that Denmark in a crisis situation, "that is, in peacetime, could be the mobilization area for 50,000 NATO soldiers with aircraft, tanks, artillery, and possibly nuclear arms."

The background to Gert Petersen's statement, which came at a press conference yesterday, is to be found in Defense Minister Poul Sogaard's interview with RITZAUS BUREAU on 16 September.

The interview indicates that he wants to change the previous stipulation for calling for reinforcements from "in the event of war" to "in a crisis."

It is Gert Petersen's view that the government here is really interfering with the 1954 resolution that there will be no stationing of foreign troops in Denmark in peacetime.

The consequence for the Socialist People's Party will be that it will vote against any defense settlement, including a so-called zero-solution with an unchanged defense budget, if the price is a change in the phrasing of security policy like the one mentioned by the defense minister, Gert Petersen said.

NORWAY

NAVY CHIEF ON POLICY IN EVENT OF DISCOVERY OF FOREIGN SUB

LD011237 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 30 Sep 80 p 8

[Egil Wettre-Jonsen report: "Norway Would Have Attacked Without Prior Warning"]

[Text] Unlike Swedish practice Norwegian naval forces would have attacked a foreign submarine with all available means if it was inside the archipelago.

If it is correct that the foreign submarine now being hunted in the Stockholm archipelago is one of the Alfa class, then it is a nuclear-powered Soviet submarine with conventional torpedos primarily intended for operation in the open sea.

"I think it highly improbable that the Soviet Union would allow so advanced a submarine to play hide-and-seek with Swedish naval forces in the Stockholm archipelago. If a similar situation had arisen inside the Norwegian archipelago, Norwegian naval forces would have attacked with missiles and depth charges without any advance warning," Rear Admiral Gustav Steimler, supreme commander of naval forces in southern Norway, told AFTENPOSTEN.

Norwegian practice in the event of the discovery of foreign submarines in Norwegian territorial waters was tightened up after the submarine episode in the Sogne Fjord in 1976.

In international open waters the submarine is warned with five handgrenades that it has 10 minutes either to come to the surface or to set a course out of Norwegian territorial waters. If it ignores the warning it is then attacked with all available means. In internal closed waters, which in practice means inside the archipelago, a foreign submarine would be attacked immediately.

Like Swedish naval defenses the Norwegian Navy makes use of a missile salvo that consists of six missiles at a time. These are spread around the submarine and either explode at a particular depth or on contact. In addition depth charges may also be used.

"Regardless of whether conscious attempts are made to hit the submarine or not, such an attack would constitute a serious danger for the submarine," Steimler said.

CP CHAIRMAN STRESSES PARTY'S OPPOSITION TO STOCKPILING

LD301543 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 29 Sep 80 p 5

[Thorleif Andreassen report: "Norwegian Communist Party To Fight Contingency Stockpiling"]

[Excerpt] The struggle for detente, disarmament and peace will be of prime concern for the Norwegian Communist Party. The party views the plans for contingency stockpiling of allied materiel in Norway with concern and anxiety. Stockpiling equipment earmarked for foreign forces is a clear breach of Norwegian base policy, Party Chairman Martin Gunnar Knutsen claimed. The Norwegian Communist Party demands a referendum on the contingency of stockpiling issue.

At a press conference after the party's national conference in Oslo yesterday, we asked Knutsen if the Norwegian Communist Party was on a collision course with the Norwegian people.

[Question] An opinion poll that was published last Saturday shows that a clear majority of those questioned want contingency stockpiling?

[Answer] Some 34 percent of those asked said no to stockpiling. It is a figure which bears witness to a great "anti" movement. I am convinced that the Norwegian Communist Party--together with other forces--would win a majority for its views in a referendum. Within the workers movement there is strong opposition to the stockpiling plans. In many places nonparty action committees are being formed to combat contingency stockpiling. The Norwegian Communist Party wants to take part in this struggle across party boundaries, Martin Gunnar Knutsen said.

THATCHER VISIT TO YUGOSLAVIA REVIEWED

LD291557 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 27 Sep 80 p 5

[James Wightman dispatch: "Detente Divides Britain and Yugoslavia"]

[Excerpt] Dubrovnik--Differences between Mrs Thatcher and Yugoslav leaders over detente with Russia were apparent last night as the prime minister ended her three-day visit to the non-aligned communist state. The Yugoslavs, concerned about worsening East-West relations, wanted a communique to put strong emphasis on the need for restoring detente. But, with her opposition to the Russians' treatment of dissidents and their invasion of Afghanistan, Mrs Thatcher was unwilling to agree to the Yugoslavs' draft communique. She wanted the Russians to be reminded that detente had to be a two-way arrangement and that action in one area--such as human rights or Afghanistan--must affect the West's attitude in other spheres.

So the communique said that the two sides "emphasised their conviction that detente is indivisible and that it should be extended to all regions and be applied to all vital international issues." The two sides could only agree on one sentence on the forthcoming Conference on Security and Economic Cooperation in Madrid where detente will be a central issue. This said that the two prime ministers, after an exchange of views, emphasises the importance which they attached to the conference.

Despite the differences over detente the discussions between the two sides were harmonious and it was a successful visit, the first by a British prime minister. Her purposes had included assessing the state of Yugoslavia after the death of President Tito earlier this year and reaffirming Britain's support for Yugoslavia's role as a non-aligned nation.

Mrs Thatcher and the Yugoslav prime minister, Mr Djuranovic, agreed that Britain and Yugoslavia should try to increase their trade. But, to the disappointment of the Yugoslavs, Mrs Thatcher was unable to offer any direct economic aid to help Yugoslavia's trading balance. This is in contrast to a large trading agreement, involving credits signed by the Yugoslavs and a high-level Russian delegation. Mrs. Thatcher encouraged the Yugoslavs to seek more markets in Britain and the EEC, but advised them to concentrate first on improving their marketing techniques.

She came under considerable pressure to take government action against the Croatiass who have been protesting in London in favour of the Yugoslav separatist movement. But she replied that although lawbreakers were dealt with, people enjoyed freedom of speech in Britain. In an indirect reference to the issue, the communqiue said: "The two prime ministers drew attention to the dangers of terrorism and repeated the determination of their governments not to permit any criminal activities which could adversely affect the friendly relations between the two countries."

Mrs Thatcher and the Yugoslav leaders spent a lot of time discussing the Russian invasion of Afghanistan. The communique had the Yugoslavs, for the first time, stating support--if only obliquely--for a Soviet withdrawal of troops.

Mrs Thatcher impressed her hosts with her detailed knowledge of international affairs, her commitment to defeating inflation and her enthusiasm for every topic raised.

PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU GIVES INDEPENDENCE DAY ADDRESS

NC301937 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 30 Sep 80

["Text" of 30 September message by President Spiros Kiprianou on the 20th Cypriot Independence Day Anniversary--live or recorded--carried almost simultaneously by Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek]

[Text] Good evening: After centuries of slavery and tyranny, Cyprus attained its independence 20 years ago. Tomorrow we are celebrating the 20th anniversary of the establishment of the Cyprus Republic. Twenty years ago Cyprus won its freedom and independence and became an equal member of the United Nations. Many struggles were waged for freedom and independence. Much blood was shed. There were many hardships and vicissitudes. Glory and honor to those who fell on the battlefield for the freedom of Cyprus. Glory and honor to those who died on the gallows. Glory and honor to all those who fought for the day of freedom to dawn.

With Ethnarch Makarios as architect, the Cyprus Republic was created. Twenty years have since gone by, and these years of independence have been turbulent and full of storms, grief and tears. I shall not today make a historical analysis of the events which led to independence, nor shall I express views on certain historical events which preceeded independence. I shall confine myself to analyzing the importance of independence for Cyprus.

In 1960, Cyprus was declared an independent state and a new life started, a new spirit, with Ethnarch Makarios, the first president of the Cyprus Republic, as its inspiration. It immediately became evident what our people could achieve in conditions of freedom, compared to the years of slavery, and a brighter future for all began to be built. This, however, did not last long, because basically exogenous factors created a new Cyprus problem. They created internal unrest and a new problem with international implications, which is today rightly considered as one of the most serious international problems.

The anomaly culminated in the junta-engineered treacherous coup of 15 July 1974 and the subsequent Turkish invasion, which resulted in the occupation by Turkish troops of 40 percent of our territory, the uprooting of 200,000 people from their ancestral homes, the thousands of dead and missing persons.

Tomorrow we are celebrating Independence Day. However, before referring to the future, we must pay homage to those who fell fighting against dictatorship and the coup. We must pay tribute to the bereaved relatives of missing persons, to the enclaved people, to the refugees and to all our people who have patiently endured the drama of recent years. Cyprus, however, did not cease to be an independent state. What we are after is not to attain but to maintain our independence, in order to reunite the whole of our state so that it may be truly independent. This time, as Ethnarch Makarios repeatedly declared, we want a completely independent state without foreign armies and interventions, a sovereign, nonaligned and united state, a state in which all its inhabitants, all citizens to whom I now address a warm greetings of love and honor--Greeks, Turks, Armenians, Maronites and Latins--may live happily and together shape a bright future for coming generations, for all the prerequisites for this are present.

Keeping away from fanaticism and passions, away from chauvinism, our target--and this must be realized by all--remains this: To secure and safeguard this time, in an ironclad manner, the independence of Cyprus--an independent state whose freedom no one will be able to threaten; an independent state in which all its people will be able to live in friendship and in conditions of peace and tranquillity.

We aim at a solution of biregional federation, and we believe that within the framework of such a solution it is possible to restore true unity among all the people of Cyprus--Greeks, Turks, Armenians, Maronites and Latins--who will live freely and peacefully, enjoying their inalienable rights which we shall never abandon.

Our aim is to completely restore the territorial integrity of our island. Our target is true freedom. Our aim is to turn Cyprus, as envisioned by Ethnarch Makarios, into a bridge of peace between North and South, between East and West. We are at the crossroads of three continents. A peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem will not only serve our own people and coming generations. It will also serve the cause of world peace and security, and Cyprus will become a centre of reconciliation instead of a hotbed of friction and conflict. This is our ambition, these are our aims, this is our target. Our struggle will continue until UN decisions on Cyprus, which contain all the necessary elements for a just and lasting solution of the Cyprus problem, are implemented; until the top-level agreements materialize through negotiations.

Negotiations are now in progress. It is too early to make forecasts on the outcome of the negotiations. The Greek Cypriot side has gone to the talks with all possible goodwill, absolutely ready for a meaningful and fruitful dialogue. With patience and perseverance we shall continue the dialogue in the hope that this time there will be progress towards a peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem.

It is argued that the problem is deinternationalized through the dialogue. On the contrary, the dialogue too is a means of internationalization. But it is also an essential way to find out whether there is a possibility for reconciliation and progress. We shall never abandon internationalization, because, basically, the Cyprus problem has international aspects and these, together with the internal aspects, make up the Cyprus problem. We want an overall and not a partial solution of the Cyprus problem. We shall continue our efforts in every direction through dialogue and persuasion to find the right solution which would secure to our people true peace and prosperity and which would safeguard their inalienable rights. We have no right to abandon the rights of the Cyprus people.

On the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the Cyprus Republic, I address myself to all and stress the need for reconciliation, understanding and friendship. Friendship between Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots, friendship among all the inhabitants of Cyprus, and unbreakable unity among the Greek Cypriots in their efforts to secure what they are entitled to. We cannot afford conflict and friction. Let us learn from the past and let us come to our senses. Let us join hands in a force that will seek the good of the country, true freedom and true independence.

Today, on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the Cyprus Republic, we underline the importance we attach to the fact that Cyprus is a state. This is our greatest weapon in our struggle for freedom and independence. The state entity of Cyprus should be continuously strengthened and not undermined. Both here in Cyprus and internationally, Cyprus's state entity, the Government of Cyprus, should be continuously strengthened, as this serves the interests of our country and our cause.

I address a special message of friendship to the Turkish Cypriots. I wish to assure them that when I address myself to the Cyprus people, and when we, the government and myself, struggle for the independence and prosperity of Cyprus, we struggle for them too, because we don't consider them as adversaries but as equal citizens of the same state. We want to build with them a future for all coming generations of which we will be proud.

Ethnarch Makarios has left the road open and we are following it. Let us go ahead with our mission with faith in our rights and the future of our country. I am absolutely confident that, if there are the necessary prerequisites--and one of them is our unity--we shall bring our mission to a conclusion and when we celebrate again the anniversary of Cyprus independence, we shall celebrate the anniversary of full independence and, at the same time, the achievement of a solution to the Cyprus problem based on freedom and justice. I believe that the future for the Cyprus people and Cyprus is bright.

Much depends on foreigners and we are doing everything possible in this direction. However, much depends on us as well. Let everyone do what he can so we may bring this anniversary of full independence and complete freedom closer.

KIPRIANOU RECEIVES ARGENTINE AMBASSADOR'S CREDENTIALS

NC301715 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in English 1620 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Text] The new ambassador of Argentina, Mr Luis Raul Claraso de la Vega, today presented his credentials to the president of the Republic, Mr Kiprianou.

Speaking at the ceremony, the Argentine envoy referred to the Cyprus problem and said that his country has consistently supported the efforts of the United Nations to promote a solution. He said: The United Nations has expressed full support for the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and nonalignment of the Republic of Cyprus and has encouraged negotiations, under the auspices of the secretary general, between representatives of the two communities. Mr Claraso de la Vega said the Argentine Government fully supported these objectives and hoped that the intercommunal talks would lead to a just and lasting settlement of the Cyprus problem.

In reply, President Kiprianou said Cyprus was grateful to Argentina for its consistent support that it had offered at the United Nations and elsewhere for the just cause of the Cyprus people for freedom. Referring to the intercommunal talks, which are resuming in Nicosia tomorrow, Mr Kiprianou said: It is very difficult to make a prediction about the talks at this stage. The only thing, I can say is that we are doing our utmost at this time after so many failures in the past and we hope that it will be possible to make some progress.

DENKTAS TAKES ISSUE WITH KIPRIANOU POSITIONS

TA011249 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that Mr Kiprianou would be undermining the intercommunal talks if he did not stop placing the Turkish Cypriot Community in the same category as that of the Armenian, Maronite and Latin minorities in Cyprus. The president was replying to questions put to him by reporters today on the celebration of the anniversary of the Cyprus Republic by the Greek Cypriots on 1 October. Mr Denktas said that 16 August was the actual anniversary but that the Greek Cypriots had shifted it to 1 October because that was the date on which Makarios and his followers decided to destroy the republican system devised by the constitution because this was considered to be an obstacle to enosis. President Denktas recalled a statement by Mr Kiprianou some years ago to the effect that the only way to enosis was to let the Greek Cypriot administration function as the Government of Cyprus.

He added that the Greek Cypriots believed that as long as they posed as the government, this would bring them closer to enosis, but this assumption brought nothing but trouble to Cypurs. President Denktas stressed that the current intercommunal talks were aimed at establishing a bizonal federation in the island. He said the UN Secretary General Mr Waldheim had clearly set out the true position regarding bizonality and biregionality in his opening statement on the occasion of the resumption of the intercommunal talks. But, the president added, if Mr Kirpriandu still wants to stick to his position, he will be responsible for the possible consequences.

President Denktas welcomed a remark made by the Greek Cypriot newspaper AGON which said that by celebrating the anniversary on 1 October, the Greek Cypriots might deceive the world but not the Turks.

MITSOTAKIS INDICATES WITHDRAWAL FROM NATO WITHOUT NEW FORMULA

ATO11650 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1630 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Greece will finally and irrevocably forced to withdraw from NATO unless a formula for its return to the Military Wing of the alliance is discovered during the immediate next few months," said Foreign Minister Mitsotakis in an interview published today in the Washington POST.

Mitsotakis added that if this new formula is not discovered, the Greek Government will be obliged to take over control of U.S. bases in Greece. "We do not desire this," he said characteristically, "nor do we want to do what De Gaulle did. Greece, however, must once again occupy the position which belongs to it within the Atlantic Alliance. Otherwise it must withdraw its request for its return before the parliamentary elections to be held in 1981."

In his interview to the Washington POST, Mitsotakis also mentioned that he informed the United States of the intentions of the Greek Government.

I KATHIMERINI REPORTS U.S. PRESSURE ONLY INCREASES UNITY

ATO11600 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 1 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] U.S. pressure does not intimidate the Greek Government while suspicious attempts aimed at destabilization only lead to the exact opposite result. In other words, they forge and strengthen the unity of the people while at the same time they unify the country's political leadership in a common policy--by the government and the opposition--on dealing with any foreign intervention in the country's domestic affairs. This is the joint conclusion of political observers in Athens and is an indirect but clear answer to the policy of the U.S. administration and the American press on the uncertainties over NATO and the U.S. bases.

The same observers stressed that under the conditions which were recently created it must be considered certain that our country's position on these two issues remains firm and immovable and that it is up to the U.S. side to realize in time that the Greek Government is neither "bluffing" nor will it renege from its declaration that: the bases will be removed from Greek territory unless uncertainty between our country and NATO is resolved within a reasonable period of time.

It was further stressed that this position not only fails to create divided opinions within the majority party--as certain American newspapers hastened to "diagnose"--but on the contrary it contributes toward confirming the unity within the Greek Government. It was observed in reference to this that barely 15 days ago National Defense Minister Evangelos Averof declared that he fully agrees with the handling of the foreign minister. This is self evident, in any case, since the Greek positions on these two important issues of foreign policy are established jointly by the appropriate foreign and defense ministries.

TA NEA REPORTS MCCLOSKEY DEMARCHE TO KARAMANLIS

ATO11545 Athens TA NEA in Greek 1 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Excerpt] In an action which is at least unprecendented in diplomatic custom, U.S. Ambassador McCloskey turned to the president of the republic K. Karamanlis requesting to be informed whether the policy of Prime Minister G. Rallis, which connects preservation of U.S. bases to our return or non-return to NATO's military wing, is also Karamanlis' own policy.

Naturally, McCloskey was not received by the president of the republic (who yet grasped the opportunity to explain that the policy of Rallis is identical with the one he pursued while he was prime minister, but he was received by the director of the president's Political Bureau, Ambassador Moliviatis. This demarche, which is obviously hostile toward G. Rallis, is the culmination of a series of activities from the U.S. side which the government already interprets as an attempt to destabilize it in order to coerce it, irrespective of the outcome of negotiations for our return, into accepting a renewal of the agreement on U.S. bases.

The government's view that this is a "destabilizing" attempt can, among other things, be deduced from the following:

1 -- Comments by a government spokesman who attributed recent and repeated reports in U.S. newspapers to an orchestrated attack.
2 -- Comments by three pro-government newspapers--one of which leans toward the "pro-Averof" group--which directly or indirectly speak of U.S. attempts to destabilize.

The Turks have now been added to the multifaceted pressure exerted upon Greece. The Turks yesterday returned--as reported from New York--to their most unprecedented positions on the question of Greece's return to NATO.

PUBLIC OPINION POLL ON RELATIONS WITH TURKEY

AT301516 Athens TAKHIDHROMOS in Greek 25 Sep 80 p 5

[From the "Backstage" column: "Relations With Turkey Will Deteriorate"]

[Text] The great majority of people believe that the establishment of a military dictatorship in Turkey will deteriorate Greek-Turkish relations.

Out of 600 Athenians of both sexes especially selected to constitute a representative sample of the capital's population, age 15 and over; 54 in 100 believe that, while the junta is in power, our relations will deteriorate; only 16 in 100 believe that relations will become smoother; a rather large percentage 30 in 100--did not reply to our question. But even if all the "doubters" join the optimists' faction--something entirely improbable--the general picture would still not change: People consider the military coup in Turkey harmful to Greek-Turkish relations.

The percentage of"I do not know" people included 36 women and 22 men. Fifty-nine percent of young people aged 15-29 believe that our relations will deteriorate. Twenty-four percent of people over 50 believe that our relations will improve. Rich and poor people gave approximately the same answers. The poll was taken for TAKHIDHROMOS by ICAP HELLAS AE late last week.

Addresses UN on Policy

LD011410 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1055 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 1 Oct (ANATOLIA)--Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has disclosed the reasons for the armed forces' takeover of the country's administration and stated that "Turkey's foreign policy will not change," in an address to the 35th UN General Assembly Session.

Turkmen pointed out that prior to the Turkish Armed Forces' takeover, a civil war had become "very probable" and that the new administration's first aim is to eradicate terror and to implement constitutional, electoral and institutional changes which will enable a return to a civilian administration within a democratic system that will satisfy the needs and aspirations of the Turkish nation in the best possible manner.

Foreign Minister Turkmen then stated Turkey's views on international topics. He said Turkey has received with satisfaction the joint U.S.-USSR announcement to the effect that they will begin talks in Geneva on the subject of "restricting nuclear weapons."

On the Middle East problem, he said the following: "Israel's policy of establishing settlements on Arab territory in defiance of UN resolutions causes concern. Jerusalem is an Arab and Muslim city and will always remain so. Turkey strongly [word indistinct] the Israeli policy that further increases the already existing threats to peace and security. The status of Jerusalem cannot be changed by faits accomplis. Turkey will never agree to this Israeli move.

"A lasting peace in the Middle East will become possible only with the recognition of all the legitimate and irrevocable rights of the Palestinian people, including that of establishing an independent state."

Turkmen said that the clash which has broken out between Iran and Iraq in a most sensitive region of the world has caused concern to Turkey and that Turkey will back the efforts by the goodwill mission created in the name of the Islamic Conference and by the UN Secretary General. Turkmen pointed out that a speedy political solution should be reached in Afghanistan, noted that the solution lies in the withdrawal of all foreign forces, and demanded the immediate implementation of the [?Islamic) Conference and of its resolutions.

Foreign Minister Turkmen announced that the new Turkish Government welcomes the intercommunal talks in Cyprus and added the following:

"It would be better not to discuss the Cyprus issue in this year's General Assembly. If it is, I would request that care be taken—for the sake of the intercommunal talks—to prevent a heated debate. Turkey's aim in Cyprus is to ensure the basic and legitimate rights of the Turkish community on the island. The sole desire of the Turkish community on the island is to live in peace with the Greek Cypriot community as equal partners of an independent, sovereign, biocommunal and biregional federal state."

VOTCP CRITICIZES NEW GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

TA300909 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 30 Sep 80

[Station commentary: "The Program of the Junta Government"]

[Text] The government, which is an extension of the junta, has announced its programme. In actual fact, this program is merely a repetition of statements previously made by the generals of the junta and consists of the conditions imposed on Turkey by international imperialist financial organizations like the IMF and the World Bank.

Ozal, the special envoy of the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie, left for Washington before the announcement of the government program; thus, this program was determined there. The program was announced in accordance with the wishes of the IMF and the imperialist monopolies. This situation once more demonstrates that the generals of the junta were motivated by the U.S. imperialists.

During the same period before the government's announcement, representatives of various imperialist circles met in Brussels through the initiative of the [word indistinct] fund, which is financed by West German monopolies. During this meeting on the situation in Turkey, imperialist circles attempted to justify the generals' action by claiming that they were forced to seize the administration. At the same time, they issued directives that the implementation of the economic decisions made by the Demirel government on 24 January should be continued. In this meeting too, the representatives of U.S. imperialism showed their control of the generals of the junta through their statements that Turkey was in need of a strong government and that this has now been realized.

What will this program, which was prepared by the imperialist monopolies, the collaborationist and monpolistic capitalists, bring to Turkey? The outcome of this program for our country and people was clear from the beginning. The junta government implemented a series of price hikes and started to lower workers' wages. While the burden of the crisis was thus being laid on the people, the profits of the monopolies were increasing under the shadow of bayonets. The conditions that are being imposed on the people are blatant. Strongly encouraging investments and attempting to unite with imperialist centers and the EEC will render the national economy entirely dependent on the outside. The state is being placed in the service of a handful of collaborationist and monopolistic capitalists, based on the view that the state should do what is necessary and not only what it is capable of doing. What is necessary consists of exploiting local and foreign capital in the best possible manner. Both public economic enterprises and all our national wealth are being handed over to a handful of local and foreign capitalists.

However, such an economic policy cannot be implemented through the force of bayonets alone. The generals of the junta are making moves to legalize the despotic system in the political and social spheres. They are trying to establish a new political system and a new state mechanism under their own supervision. The dissolution of the Parliament, the abolition of the Constitution, the closing down of political parties, associations and the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK], and the dismissal of all democratically elected administrations, including provincial and district mayors, constitute the first steps of this move. The constitution prepared by the generals of the junta, the new laws of oppression and the laws on elections and political parties, comprise the other steps of this move.

The junta has prepared an internal statute for itself in order to enhance the sovereignty of the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie, which is dependent on imperialism and NATO, and to ensure the establishment of such a political system.

This internal statute grants unlimited rights to the junta. However, it also indicates the existence of discord among the generals of the junta.

As stated in the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] appeal to our people and to all progressive, patriotic and democratic forces against the pro-American junta, neither the junta nor its government can solve the basic problems of our country and people. They cannot overcome the crises. The program submitted by the junta government does not aim at solving the basic problems of the country and our people. It merely aims to lay the burden of the crisis on the toiling people, to perpetuate dependence on imperialism and to further strengthen the sovereignty of the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie. Such programs have, in the past, led our country into deep crises. The governments of the 12 March 1971 period were also presented to the people with such programs. However, it has been observed that the people do not and will not bow down to such extreme exploitation and robbery. The 12 March governments were destroyed one after the other. Our people and the democratic forces, which defend the interests of the people and the national interests, will destroy the pro-American generals of the junta together with their programs of dependence, exploitation and robbery. The TCP calls on all people's forces and all the national democratic forces to unite against the pro-American junta!

AUSTRIAN-USSR TALKS ON SOVIET GAS TO OPEN IN VIENNA

AU012112 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 30 Sep 80 p 9

["M.F."-signed report: "Third Round of Talks On Soviet Gas in Vienna"]

[Text] Vienna--The gas negotiations between the Austrian Oil Administration Corporation and the Soviet Union are entering the third round. A soviet delegation--coming from Rome--is expected in Vienna at the middle of the week to continue talks about additional gas deliveries after 1984 and increases in prices for the current contracts. Austria currently receives 2.5 billion cubic meters of natural gas annually from the Soviet Union. Under the agreed-upon escalator clause, which is mainly oriented towards heating oil prices, the price for the Russian natural gas would rise from the present 1.71 schillings to somewhat over 2 schillings per cubic meter effective 1 October. However, the Soviet Union is pushing for an adjustment of the escalator clause to relate gas prices to those of oil and even now wants to implement a price of some 2.30 schillings per cubic meter.

As of 1984 Austria wants to purchase additionally at least 3 billion cubic meters annually within the framework of a new Soviet gas delivery deal with Western Europe. Prices are the snag there, too, because the Soviet concept would involve at least doubling prices. The firms interested in pipeline subcontracts, chiefly the Voest Alpine Corporation and representatives of banks--the deal would have to prefinanced by a 15 billion schilling loan--will also participate in the forthcoming talks.

TRADE MINISTER DISCUSSES COAL, LOANS WITH POLAND

AU011213 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 30 Sep 80 p 9

["Sug"-signed report: "Polish Wishes for Loans Cannot Be Fulfilled"]

[Summary] Vienna--"The coal delivery contracts [of Poland] with Austria are being strictly fulfilled despite work stoppages. This was stated by Trade Minister Staribacher. He conducted talks in Poland last week within the framework of the mixed commission.

"On that occasion Poland suggested that Austria should make available a loan totaling some 21 billion schillings for the construction of coal power plants, in return for which Austria could receive additional electric power deliveries. But such loan was out of the question for Austria, according to Staribacher. Such a task must be assumed by an international consortium."

Staribacher expects the National Council to soon pass the guarantee law for the $300 million loan granted by Austria to Poland in connection with coal deliveries. The Austrian bank group providing the loan has already provided one half, that is $150 million, on account.

This year an overall volume of some 10 billion schillings is expected in Austrian-Polish foreign trade. Imports from Poland rose 22 percent in the first 7 months of this year, exports by only 8 percent, however,

FRENCH PREMIER HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE IN VIENNA

AU011114 Vienna VIENER ZEITUNG in German 27 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Report on press conference by French Premier Raymond Barre: "Fruitful Working Talks with the Federal Chancellor--Chances for Economic Cooperation on Purchases of Mirage interceptors--Weapons Deliveries to Iraq;" in Vienna on 26 September]

[Excerpts] The 3-day special visit of French Premier Raymond Barre came to an end yesterday. France's head of government left Vienna in the afternoon by special plane after having given a luncheon for his hosts at the French embassy. Barre also paid a visit to parliament where he was greeted by the president and two vice presidents of the national council and by several deputies.

At a press conference, Premier Barre stressed that the exchange of ideas with the Austrian federal chancellor comprised several important topics. European security and the Middle East problem were the primary topics of the deliberations on Thursday. Bilateral problems were discussed by the ministers of departments in a bigger group.

The offer for delivery of Mirage interceptors came up for discussion yesterday, Barre said. This was followed, according to Barre, by a thorough exchange of ideas about the North-South dialog.

Answering a journalist's question Barre pointed out that he had not come to Austria to sell interceptor planes of the Mirage type, since that is a concern of the appropriate experts. He only briefly touched on that topic but made it known that payment by compensation would be possible should Austria decide in favor of the deal. As a result, industrial cooperation in aircraft construction, with the application of progressive technologies, would be elevated to a standard which far exceeded this deal.

Barre said the topic of nuclear power was not broached in the talks, when he was asked whether France would be involved in talks on the final storage of Austrian nuclear waste. He said he did not want to interfere in a current domestic policy discussion in Austria. The premier also displayed great interest in the Austrian proposals for a European security conference, for cooperation in the sphere of power supplies and in the plan of Federal Chancellor Kreisky for convening a North-South summit conference.

Asked about arms sales to Iraq, Barre stated that this problem must not be considered in an isolated manner. Military cooperation is only part of a comprehensive cooperation in the field of industry, the transfer of progressive technology and culture. A total of 4,500 Frenchmen are working in Iraq, and both states have maintained good political relations for many years. After all, one should consider the extent of arms purchases from other states. The premier dealt with the problem of the CSCE follow-up conference. He stressed that detente efforts have suffered from actions such as that in Afghanistan, and recalled the French disarmament plan. He had heard with interest Doctor Kreisky's proposals for European cooperation in the energy sector and would follow them up. Mediation of France in the Iran-Iraq conflict as an isolated action is out of the question, [Barre said], France is active within the framework of the United Nations, however.

DUTCH MINISTER ON PROTECTING GULF OIL SUPPLY

LD021421 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 1 Oct 80 p 6

[Our own correspondent report: "Plans for Protecting Oil Supply Denied"]

[Text] The Hague--According to Foreign Minister van der Klaauw there is at present no question of discussing plans to form an international naval force to guarantee oil supplies from the Persian Gulf. All efforts must be directed toward finding a diplomatic solution to the conflict between Iran and Iraq. The minister made these statements in verbal consultations on Tuesday evening with the second chamber foreign affairs standing committee.

In making these statements the minister was reacting to reports that U.S. President Carter had asked Japan, France, Britain and West Germany to join in the formation of such a naval force. However, according to Van der Klaauw, no specific proposals have been made by Carter and, according to reports which he has obtained from Washington, no military action is planned. "Emphasis is being placed on diplomatic efforts to find a solution," according to Van der Klaauw. In reply to questions from the Christian Democratic Appeal and the Radical Political Party he assured the chamber that the Netherlands is not acting as an export base or transit point for weapons to Iraq and Iran. It is extremely unwise to supply weapons to one of the two sides now, Van der Klaauw said, adding that he can say "with great certainty" that the other EC countries are not supplying any weapons to the warring sides either.

MOBUTU ACCUSES BELGIUM OF RENEGING ON MILITARY ACCORDS

LD020957 Brussels LE SOIR in French 28-29 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

[Jean Pochet undated New York interview with Zairian president Mobutu: "Belgium Has Politicized the Zairian Problem"]

[Excerpt] "There is only one cloud in relations between Zaire and Belgium but an important cloud--the problem of 'oppositionists' whom I would call 'so-called oppositionists.' In my view, they are imposters who publish a lot of communiques to hamper my government's--I would say, Mobutu's--actions," the president of the Zairian Republic told us during an interview which took place at the Waldorf Astoria in New York where he is on a private visit.

"Our attitude toward oppositionists to the regime is clear. We intervene in a friendly manner. We throw them out and we only hope that once they are in a European country they remain as discreet as we are.

"However, this has not always been the case. For instance, the former commissioner (minister) for education (LE SOIR note: a reference to Mr Mungul-Diakat, a political refugee in Belgium) who stole tens of millions from state funds, was cordially received in Brussels. Here is a man who dipped his fingers in the cash box, was put under house arrest and fled, whose complete dossier was sent to the commissioner (minister) for justice and who was clearly proved guilty of corruption but was received with all honors in Brussels.

"I, personally, found it very difficult to accredit him in Brussels in 1968 and now that he comes as a thief he is being received with all honors.

"I am categorical about this: Anyone against Mobutu is considered OK. This applies only to Belgium. In other European countries, people who are opposed to my presence are usually discreet and enjoy no favors.

"The Zairian problem has been politicized for 2 years. This is becoming a game which divides not only parties but also politicians.

"Do you want more proof? We have concluded military agreements with Belgium to reorganize the army.

"Belgium was supposed to organize an infantry brigade. But when the final test came, that is, maneuvers were to take place, Belgium said 'no,' no military operations. And yet there is a clear distinction between 'military operations' and 'maneuvers.'

"However, this is a distinction which the Belgian government refuses to make. And where does this lead us? In 1977 and 1978, at the time of the Shaba events, we knew to whom we could appeal. This is no longer the case....

"And why have the French, who have been training our paratroops, agreed to organize two of the five maneuvers promised? This also applies to the Chinese who came later but who have promised to organize general maneuvers in 1983 with the troops which they will have trained. Why such discrimination on the part of the Belgians? Why not carry out the test to the end?"

Foreign Minister Nothomb's Reply

Brussels LE SOIR in French 30 Sep 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "'Belgian Policy Unchanged,' Mr Nothomb Replies to Mr Mobutu"]

[Text] Asked about the content of the interview given by President Mobutu to our newspaper in which the Zairian head of state asserted that Belgium is not respecting military agreements for the reorganization of the Zairian army, our foreign minister, Charles-Ferdinant Nothomb, made a point of explaining that our country has merely been implementing agreements concluded under the preceding government in 1979 and that there has been absolutely no change in Belgian policy in this sphere.

According to the Belgian foreign minister, Belgium undertook to train Zairian military cadres but there never was any provision in bilateral agreements either for our military personnel to officer Zairian units or for them to participate in maneuvers. In fact, it is on this point, "to which we adhere because this is, we believe, a most sensible policy to follow," that we differ from the French and the Chinese, who have also concluded military cooperation agreements with Zaire, the minister added.

LE FIGARO VIEWS SUPERPOWERS' 'TRICKY GAME' IN GULF WAR

LD021459 Paris LE FIGARO in French 1 Oct 80 p 3

[Parul-Marie de la Gorce article: "The Tricky Game Played by Washington and Moscow in the Middle East"]

[Text] The people killed in Baghdad, Khorramshahr and Abadan have led Americans and Soviets to reopen their vital dialogue. However, it would be wrong to deduce from this that Washington and Moscow are going to combine their efforts and act in the same way as if they shared the same objectives: Aside from their common concern to avoid direct confrontation with each other, they clearly have different objectives.

However, there is an initial problem for both the United States and Russia: the problem of their means of taking action. The current crisis shows precisely how limited they are. It broke out without their consent and is being fought between two countries which are fiercely attached to their independence and will to determine their own future.

It is Washington, above all, which is finding it difficult to act: The United States has no official diplomatic relations with either Iran or Iraq. It does, of course, have means of speaking to the two countries but, being regarded as "imperialists" and enemies of Iran, as they were previously enemies of Iraq, the Americans are virtually paralyzed politically speaking.

The Soviet Union is in a different position: It has normal relations with the warring parties. It is linked with the Iraqis by a cooperation treaty and has signed trade agreements with the existing Iranian regime. However, it remembers having been described as a "great Satan" by the Ayatollah Khomeyni and everybody knows that the Iraqi policy, after the 1978 revolution in Afghanistan and especially since last year, has been aimed at protecting the Gulf monarchies and the region's stability, which is a far cry from Soviet concerns.

In fact, in addition to its longstanding tradition of negotiating with Iraq, Moscow has real means of influencing that country: It has provided virtually all the equipment possessed by Iraq's armed forces, especially its army. Everybody knows that in protracted conflicts the need for supplies, munitions, spare parts and so forth forces the warring nation to turn to its supplier. The supplier then has decisive means of influencing the development of the crisis. Iraq might soon be forced to turn to Moscow. It is probably because it foresaw that--in addition to other reasons--that it considerably improved its relations with the Soviet Union in the weeks prior to the war.

What objectives, however, could the two superpowers have in this crisis?

It is clear that, above all, the United States wants the fall of Ayatollah Khomeyni's regime. However, the question is not only if that is possible but what result it would have. If the war were to give the Iranian Army a greater role and bring about the return of at least some of its former officers, it is possible that the regime would become flexible enough for relations with the United States ultimately to be normalized: This is what Iranian President Bani-Sadr is thought to be trying to achieve. In that case, supplies of U.S. arms for the Iranian forces would give the United States a powerful means of influencing Tehran. However, if the Iranian Army defeats were to lead to the country's collapse, the Soviets could then have opportunities to maneuver in a way which U.S. officials fear: the crisis could then take an extremely serious turn. If, on the other hand, Iran defends itself effectively, the current regime could both take a harder line and be consolidated.

Washington is simply trying to put itself in a position to act if necessary. This is certainly the significance of the U.S. proposal to set up a Western naval force which would guarantee freedom of passage through the Strait of Hormuz. Indeed, the United States is not facing any supply problem. [paragraph continues]

The objective is political and strategic: The U.S. leaders want to be in a position to take action on the spot. For them this is primarily a menas of returning to a region where their influence has been partly eliminated.

The Soviets are in a position to act in any direction: It has been clear since the beginning of the crisis that they want to keep one foot in each camp so that, if necessary, they can exploit developments in the crisis both in Iran and in Iraq. Their fear is the exact reverse of what the Americans want: If the Iranian regime bends as a result of increased power in the army and as a result there is a rapprochement with Washington, the outcome would not be good for Moscow--even though some Soviet leaders would like to see the fall of a regime whose Islamic fervor, religious proselytism on the USSR's borders, anti-communist vehemence and sympathy for the Afghan rebellion strike them as dangerous.

In fact, the Soviets have two objectives. Ultimately they want to be in a position to arbitrate in the conflict. Moscow is secretely continuing to supply Iraq: These supplies might be stepped up in February and Soviet diplomacy could hence exert pressure on Baghdad and Tehran at the same time.

In the short term they want to ensure the success of a more important operation--the one between the Soviet Union and Syria. Moscow hopes shortly to be able to conclude a security treaty with Syria similar to the one signed with Cuba, Angola and South Yemen. To prevent any major reaction the Soviet leaders clearly have to give the Iraqis the necessary assurances and concessions and aid and at the same time exert on them the discreet pressure which their position as arms supplier enables them to exert. The present crisis must not disguise what is happening here: The strengthening of political and military ties between the USSR and Syria would have extremely far-reaching consequences for the entire region.

Nobody can disregard the risks posed by a continuation of the conflict. They are not only political--with the rivalry between the superpowers--and strategic--with the changes in the military situation round the Gulf--but above all economic with the mutual destruction causing long-lasting damage to the warring parties' oil-producing capacities whose consequences for Europe will soon be felt.

Hence, the importance of any initiative to stop the war.

However, the course of the confrontation is going beyond what the states want or do not want: It is not easy to control it.

GISCARD OUTLINES BASIC PRINCIPLES OF FRENCH DEFENSE

LD011505 Paris LE FIGARO in French 30 Sep 80 p 1

[Unattributed Report: "Defense: Countering All Threats"]

[Text] On the feast of St Michael, patron saint of paratroopers, Valery Giscard d'Estaing visited the Caylus Camp (Tarn-et-Garonne) where he recalled the fundamental principles governing French defense policy. The main idea put forward by the head of state is that there can be no gaps in the security sphere and that our country must be able to face all conflict situations from whatever quarter and in whatever form they arise. On this occasion Valery Giscard d'Estaing reaffirmed his hostility to a reduction in the length of military service and stated that there can be no question of having two armies. Finally, Valery Giscard d'Estaing announced the formation of a women's paratroop detachment.

--"There can be no gaps in security matters. France must be able to face all threats whatever their course, their location or their nature."

--"France needs highly mobile and readily available forces capable of intervening immediately to maintain peace and defend French interests wherever they might be threatened. Our overseas action forces meet that need."

--"There must not be two armies. While the regiments have to be specialized to be readily available and suited to their mission, the officers must be rotated among the difference army units. This continual exchange is vital. The army must benefit from the dynamism and experience of the paratroop units."

--"These units were to be somewhat undermined by the army reorganization plan. I decided to alter that plan to keep this component of our forces intact, for three reasons: the need to have enough immediately available units, the quality of training which makes your division a great unit among the best in the world, and the atmosphere in your regiments which influences the young draftees."

--"Reducing the length of military service would make the whole world doubt France's will to ensure its defense and also France's will as such."

--"I have asked the defense minister to study the formation of a women's paratroop detachment in order to give humanitarian backup in battle." (care of the wounded, aid to populations and so forth)

--"The usefulness and interest of military service for young people must be improved by the three following provisions: drawing up a 5-year plan to develop sport and open air activities throughout our forces, placing modern fighting equipment at the draftees' disposal (among other things doubling the production of the new automatic rifle as from 1981), and improving the organization of reserve forces capable of taking part in the same battles at short notice. "

PREMIER BARRE DESCRIBES TALKS WITH AUSTRIA'S KREISKY

LD011223 Paris LE MONDE in French 28-29 Sep 80 p 26

[Alain Rollat dispatch on French Prime Minister Raymond Barre statements in Vienna: "France Need Not Be Taught Any Lessons on the Subject of Arms' Sale"]

[Text] Vienna--The final talk between Mr Barre, who left Vienna on 26 September, and Mr Kreisky was almost completely devoted to international affairs, especially the North-South dialogue.

"We regret that this dialogue has met with many obstacles, which have not been put up by industrialized countries, and that this problem has been dealt with in a confused manner without taking into account any differences in the situation among developing countries," Mr Barre stated. "We hope that after the disappointing discussions which have taken place at the United Nations, progress will be achieved and other initiatives considered."

Therefore, it is with "friendly interest" that France has noted Austria's and Mexico's initiative aimed at convening a summit of the countries concerned, an initiative completely consistent with France's own suggestion. Mr Barre and Mr Kreisky discussed only briefly the only outstanding bilateral dossier, namely, a plan for selling 24 Mirage-50 aircraft to Austria. "I merely told the chancellor that if Austria were to make a positive decision on the subject we would certainly ensure that this operation is accompanied by compensations which, in our view, should take the form of closer industrial cooperation in the aeronautical and advanced technological spheres," Mr Barre stated. Asked about French arms' supplies to Iraq, Mr Barre stated rather tartly that cooperation between Paris and Baghdad "has not been limited to military cooperation. The problem of arms' sales is only a limited problem within the framework of Iraqi-French cooperation as a whole," he added. "I would like once and for all to tell those who are interested in sales of arms by France kindly to consider the question of sales of arms by other countries. I am stating now as clearly as possible that we need not be taught any lesson by anyone on the subject."

Mr Barre expressed the hope that the European Council (summit of the Nine) will adopt during its December meeting a "positive and effective attitude" toward the Israeli-Palestinian problem following the conclusion of the mission to the Near East of its chairman, Thorn.

Discussing disarmament, Mr Barre stated that France "expects not merely cosmetic but significant measures inspiring confidence."

In the economic sphere, it will support the Austrian proposal for an East-West conference on energy problems. Certain questions led Mr Barre to make some comparisons concerning domestic politics rather than international affairs. For instance, the prime minister was pleased to observe that the Austrian economic and social system "has shown that monetary stability does not rule out a high employment level." Referring to those who have blamed him for sacrificing employment in France to support the currency, Mr Barre added: "I hope that the Austrian example will be able to dispel some misconceptions which continue to be seen as brilliant or at least progressive in some French circles." The prime minister also stated that he was pleased with the "friendly" nature of his talks with the deputy chairman of the socialist international before declaring, however, that the courtesy which prevails in international relations "is, unfortunately, not always possible in domestic relations," a way of saying: "Ah, if only French Socialists were as nice as Austrian Social Democrats!

FORLANI ASKED BY PRESIDENT TO FORM NEW GOVERNMENT

AU021540 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 2 Oct (ANSA)--Christian Democratic Party Chairman Anraldo Forlani today accepted with the usual reservations the task of forming a new government to replace the one that stepped down Saturday. The former administration led by Francesco Cossiga was a three-way coalition of Christian Democrats (DC), the Socialists (PSI) and the tiny Republican Party (PRI).

Head-of-State Sandro Pertini tapped the 55 year-old Forlani for the premier-designated job this morning. It was the second time that the Christian Democrat was summoned to the Quirinale Palace to be asked to form a cabinet to settle a government crisis. The last time, however, following the June elections of last year, Forlani declined the offer. The man has served several times as foreign and defense ministers and has been a minister without portfolio for special affairs and state participation minister.

Forlani has held numerous posts with the DC, becoming deputy secretary and later national secretary (1969 to 1973).

The mandate conferred on Forlani is very broad as deduced by statements made by the premier-designate himself.

He said that the best way to meet the present difficulties was to have a government enjoying wide consensus and a broad parliamentary base. This might mean that Forlani planned to move in the direction of a five way alliance which would see the liberals and the social democrats joining the former government partners.

Forlani also underscored the need for democratic coresponsibility and national cohesion which was interpreted by some observers as an allusion to a more positive relationship with the communist opposition.

NUCLEAR ENERGY OFFICIAL DEFENDS REACTOR DEAL WITH IRAQ

LD030921 Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 28 Sep 80 p 251

[Gianfranco Modolo interview with National Nuclear Energy Commission Chairman Umberto Colombo; "The Affair Is Explosive, Even Without Nuclear Bomb"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Text] Rome--"We would lose all credibility in Italy and also abroad if we decided not to carry through the contract with Iraq. And moreover, we are certain that we have done nothing illegal; we have not been caught red-handed, so we will hold out and not backtrack." National Nuclear Energy Commission [CNEN] Chairman Umberto Colombo showed no hesitation in his replies: The five nuclear laboratories which SNIA Techint has supplied to Iraq and which are now lying idle at a large research center on the outskirts of Baghdad will be tested and set in operation by the CNEN technicians despite the attempts and threats of the self-styled Islamic revolutionary committees against the Italian executives supervising the deal.

This was also discussed during the visit which the Iraqi delegation made to Rome last week: Failure on the part of Italy to meet the other party's requests for nuclear technology could create difficulties for economic relations between the two countries.

And yet, we asked Colombo, the U.S. press has asserted on several occasions that as a result of the CNEN's supplies, Iraq could equip itself with a nuclear bomb, and this in contempt of the nuclear nonproliferation treaty, signed both by Italy and Iraq. [paragraph continues]

"Bearing in mind that this is an election year in the United States and all means are good for winning votes, I should emphasize," Colombo replied, "that our five laboratories have nothing to do with nuclear technology." "They cannot produce or process plutonium, as has been incorrectly stated. Then there are facts of form and substance. With respect to the former, it must be said that Italy and Iraq, as signatories of the treaty, have pledged themselves to respect the regulations of the International Atomic Energy agency in Vienna."

[question] And with respect to the substance?

[Answer] Well, you must realize that during the planning stage of the five laboratories, we took the necessary precautions to ensure that in the future, when they are completely handed over to the Iraqis, they cannot be reused for purposes different from the original purposes. Nor would their components, used individually, be capable of functioning for military purposes. And moreover, let us be frank; how could Italy, which does not possess and does not wish to possess the technology for a nuclear bomb, supply it to a third country?

[Question] Are these Islamic revolutionary committees credible? Who, in your opinion, is hiding behind this name?

[Answer] We are confronted with a country--Iraq--which is emerging and is aspiring to play a prominent role in its own area, not only militarily but also economically. This fact is causing concern in the neighboring countries. In my opinion, this could be the mainspring behind the committees. Next, drawing up a scale of hypotheses, I could place on it Israel, which for obvious reasons is concerned about every development in the nuclear field within its own sphere of influence, and last, the United States, for other, also obvious, reasons. However, these considerations should not make us stop cooperation with Iraq; that would mean penalizing not only the CNEN and SNIA Techint but also the entire Italian industrial apparatus.

[Question] Perhaps because Iraqi oil supplies to Italy would be jeopardized?

[Answer] Not only that, Colombo replied. Iraq is deciding to construct a 600 megawatt nuclear power plant. If we did not honor this contract, how could we acquire credibility for the far more onerous and demanding contract for a powerful reactor?

[Question] Have there been any other threats and attempts since those in August?

[Answer] No. There have been no attempts. However, I reiterate what I already said at the beginning: We are in the right and they will not intimidate us.

[Giulietto Chiesa report: "United States Behind Italian-Iraqi Contacts"]

[Excerpts] Rome--Now that fighting has broken out I am reminded of the warm evening of Sunday 23 June when some 80 people, all Italians, were gathered on the well tended lawn of our ambassador's splendid residence in Baghdad.

Not 2 months had gone by since the abortive U.S. raid and the Iranian-Iraqi border was still in a state of turmoil. [paragraph continues]

[Public Holdings] Minister Gianni De Michelis was saying of the staying power of the Iranian revolution: "I wouldn't bet a plugged nickel on it." It would be better to look toward Baghdad with its strong army, its oil reserves (no less than 200 billion barrels according to the latest estimates) and its shrewd policy of openness to the West. Indeed, De Michelis had come to Baghdad partly to finalize a contract for the supply of 11 warships to the Iraqi navy. The value of the order was 2 trillion lire; the contractor was "United Naval Shipyards" (of the Industrial Reconstruction Institute-Shipyards Finance corporation group); while the marine engines were U.S.-made by General Electric.

The obvious objection was: "How can the Italian Government, whose Mideast policy is among the most closely aligned with the United States, be supplying the navy of ultra-intransigent Iraq? And what is more, with U.S. engines?"

It was known that the U.S. Senate had voted, under pressure from the Israel lobby, to halt the authorization of sales of and issue of licenses to build General Electric engines to countries supplying military materials to certain Arab countries, including Iraq. Carter had, and still has, no intention of making enemies with the powerful Jewish lobby and had therefore hushed up the entire issue. It was then that Minister De Michelis confided that a few days earlier a telephone call from Secretary of State Muskie and given the Italian Government the go-ahead. "Proceed by all means," Muskie apparently said: "As soon as the President has been reelected the U.S. Senate will be made to see reason too." And it was the minister who also implied that evening that there was U.S. assent even on the delicate subject of Italian-Iraqi cooperation in the nuclear sector. Agreement had not yet been finalized on this point because Iraq's demands were much greater than the Italians (and Americans) were willing to concede. The Americans were very irritated with the French decision to supply Iraq with a particle accelerator. According to the same source, Iraq is still a long way from building the bomb, and the nuclear information it has at its disposal has hitherto been fragmentary, since the Americans are determined to supply it very gradually so as to keep Iraq bound to prospects of cooperation. The French initiative apparently worried Washington because it obviously implied the risk of Iraq gaining nuclear technology too rapidly for America's plans. I was reminded then that last year an Iraqi scientist was assassinated in Paris--by Israeli agents, it was alleged--and that also last year an unknown terrorist group destroyed a French factory containing completed nuclear research equipment destined for Iraq.

Now that war has broken out we can see what an unpleasant affair it was. And we can also see that Italy is involved in it to a large extent, by providing a coverup for operations which have, at the very least, enabled the United States to cast the stone but hide its hand and the Iraqi Government to attempt a game which appears to be disastrous.

Now the State Department has announced that it "has called for the temporary suspension" of Italy's sale of the six General Electric engines destined for the Iraqi navy frigates being built in Italian shipyards. The obvious aim is to demonstrate the U.S. professed neutrality in the Iraqi-Iranian conflict. It is a smokescreen for the unwary. But what has been done so far? And what does the Italian Government have to say?

L'UNITA: PCI WITHDRAWS FROM CONFERENCE ON AFGHANISTAN

[Unattributed article: "Conference Takes on Different Complexion; PCI Will Not Be Taking Part"]

[Text] In July the magazine MONDOPERAIO promoted a conference, taking place today and tomorrow, on the subject "The Left for Afghanistan" and invited the Communists, among others, to attend. Our party had no difficulty in supporting the initiative; appointing Foreign Policy Studies Center secretary and Central Committee member Comrade Romano Ledda to represent it, and deciding to contribute to the conference's debate with full respect for the stances that would emerge from it. The PCI's position on the USSR's intervention in Afghanistan is clear: condemnation of the intervention, the return to the Afghan people of their sovereignty, independence and self-determination and the withdrawal of Soviet troops, with a quest--to this end--for a political solution with the cooperation of all the states concerned. Also, though aware that differences exist regarding initiatives to positively resolve the Afghan crisis, the Communists consider an open and constructive debate among the leftwing forces profitable and are constantly seeking it.

There would have been no reason to alter this decision had it not been for the new factors which emerged right on the eve of the conference, influencing in advance both its proceedings and the positions of those taking part.

Indeed, over the past few days the promoters of the conference have been distributing a program-leaflet whose stance, all in all, leaves little scope for calm political and non-propagandist discussion on the Afghan tragedy. At the same time they have released a declaration (PANORAMA 29 September) which launches an artificial polemic on Afghanistan itself with the PCI and its secretary general, and which dictates to them certain political and organizational conclusions for the conference, the acceptance of which would be a "turning point bound to have repercussions on domestic policy too".

In short, the conference would carry out an examination of the PCI, from the results of which a verdict would be passed on its international and national credibility. Apart from this unacceptable procedure, an international event is again transparently being manipulated for domestic ends.

The PCI is too strongly attached to its dignity and independence and too concerned over the gravity of the international crisis--which has become even more dramatic in the past few hours--to be able to accept all this. Therefore, it has been decided not to take part in the proceedings of the MONDOPERAIO conference, accepting instead the invitation to discuss the issues raised by the Afghan crisis at a round table discussion with Claude Estier of the PS, Alfonso Guerra of the PSOE, Lucio Colletti, Jean Ellenstein, Caludio Martelli and Romano Ledda.

Somebody will undoubtedly start griping about an alleged reemergence of communist splittism, backtracking and so forth. He will be mistaken. The decision stems not only from the rejection of predetermined pressures but also from the sense of responsibility with which the Italian communists are contending with the problems of the Italian and European left and of a positive solution to the Afghan tragedy, at such a delicate moment in international and national life.

BERLINGUER VIEWS INTERNATIONAL CRISES, DOMESTIC ISSUES

LD010901 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 26 Sep 80 p 3

["Excerpts" of Eugenio Scalfari interview with PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer, published in Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA 26 September: "World's 'Hotspots' and Italian Policy"]

[Text] Rome—The "hottest" points of Italian and foreign politics (ranging from the Iranian-Iraqi conflict to Poland, Afghanistan, relations among the major powers and domestic issues including the government, the left and socialist-communist relations) are the subject of a lengthy interview that Comrade Enrico Berlinguer granted to Eugenio Scalfari, published by LA REPUBBLICA today.

The entire first part of the conversation (from which we reprint lengthy excerpts) is devoted to the major international issues—starting, of course, with the war in the Middle East which "must not," the PCI secretary general says, "be made to explode just for control of the Shatt al-'Arab: The area is of vital importance to the entire world; the fleets of the major powers meet in the gulf and it is the heart of oil supplies. It is no coincidence that the area is often called the 'gray area,' meaning that it is a part of the world removed from the direct influence of either of the major powers and where they are in harsh competition, with the dangers stemming from the local state of confusion, instability and conflicts which we have witnessed in the events of recent years. It is unthinkable, in such a dangerous situation, that the Iraqis are acting entirely on their own initiative."

What is to be done? "It is necessary," Berlinguer replies, "that all sides work to extinguish the flames of war. The maximum commitment must come from the United States and the USSR. But Europe too can and must act with prompt initiatives aimed at co-operation and peace; and our country has a significant role to play, if for no other reason than the recent important agreements signed with Iraq. Clearly, if Iraq's initiative stemmed from the aim of destroying Iran, it would be a very dangerous calculation. A chain reaction of conflicts could begin in the region, possibly leading to a general conflict. This must be prevented at all costs."

Next, in answer to a question from Scalfari, Berlinguer discusses the situation in Iran: "The revolution in Iran has been a major positive event, with the downfall of the Shah's regime. It is true that subsequently the Islamic extremists who lead the country committed some serious errors. But the United States is no less to blame. Essentially, the United States has never agreed to acknowledge the reality of the Iranian revolution and to radically alter its policy; a self-criticism with regard to the errors committed in shoring up the shah's regime has never taken place in practice.... and if Iran had not been isolated and abandoned to itself, especially over the past year, the political chaos in Tehran would probably not have reached the level that it has in recent months. The game of reprisals set in motion by the United States has prevailed."

Next, Scalfari asks several questions concerning Afghanistan. For one, why, in his speech at the L'UNITA festival in Bologna, did Berlinguer omit the issue? "I did not discuss Afghanistan," the PCI secretary general replies, "just as I did not discuss 1,000 other foreign policy issues, because I designed my speech in accordance with another specific line of reasoning. In any case, our position on Afghanistan has been clear from the outset and has not changed in the slightest.... The PCI is certainly not a fluctuating and fickle party that changes its mind over a period of weeks or months."

The Soviet Union, Scalfari says, had in mind a military walkover; do you not believe, instead, that Afghanistan is becoming another Vietnam?

"There are some profound differences," Berlinguer says, pointing up two of the principal ones: The USSR's military commitment is very different from that of the United States, and there is a shared border between the USSR and Afghanistan.

Does this mean, LA REPUBBLICA'S editor asks, that the USSR intervened because it was summoned by a legitimate and friendly government?

"I am not saying that," Berlinguer replies. "There is no doubt that the USSR must withdraw its occupying troops. But it is a fact that in that region there are also problems concerning the guaranteeing and security of the Soviet borders. The West must not neglect to take this factor of prime importance into account. Afghan autonomy must be guaranteed, and at the same time the USSR's concern for its security must be borne in mind. From this viewpoint, I see an important role for Europe and the nonaligned countries' movement. In my opinion, the proposal put forward by Pakistan in midsummer must be taken up and developed."

The conversation turned to the topic of Poland. Why did the USSR intervene in Kabul but not in Gdansk?

"The USSR realized," Berlinguer says, "that certain major changes had become necessary in Poland. I do not mean by this that the USSR likes all the changes taking place in Poland; I am saying that they realized that there was no other way, that the errors committed by the Polish Communist Party were serious ones and that the contact with the masses and workers was dangerously depleted. In any case, the Polish workers themselves did not challenge the socialist foundations of the Polish society and state or the alliance with the USSR."

Afghanistan and Poland

Not satisfied with this reply, Eugenio Scalfari persists with his line of questioning, adding further arguments: "The Socialist state and communist leadership were indeed challenged, and how: The strikes were against the party's and government's policy, the party and government leadership emerged defeated and the church had to intervene....so why did the USSR intervene in Kabul but not in Warsaw?"

"Why should the USSR always intervene militarily everywhere?" Berlinguer asks. "Allow me to say that your question, which is such a repetitious and persistent one, betrays a kind of obsession or disbolization....you always expect the USSR's armed intervention because you always regard it solely as an oppressive gendarme...."

"You will admit that there is no lack of supportive evidence for this view," Scalfari rejoins.

[Answer] "But events must always be set in their historical framework and interpreted critically....by using your Manicheam categories, events would lead us to assert that every upheaval in the western area is maneuvered by the CIA and U.S. politics...."

[Question] But do you not in fact have a tendency to diabolize the United States?

[Answer] "In the past we have lapsed into excessive oversimplifications (but in very different times from these.) We are now experiencing a much more complex situation and our critical faculties are much sharper. It is stupid to say that the CIA or the multinationals are always "behind" everything...but it is also stupid to dismiss the USSR as a stubborn, merciless and tyrranical gendarme." [answer ends]

The conversation returns to the Soviets' failure to intervene in Poland.

[Question] Why did it happen in Kabul but not in Warsaw?

[Answer] In Afghanistan the USSR had the impression that a friendly leadership group was in an untenable position; in Poland this was not so. Furthermore, the USSR had to take into account the critical stances adopted by almost the entire nonaligned world and the majority of progressive and democratic forces, not to mention many authoritative communist and workers parties—and these are the stances which carried the most weight. The Soviet Union has nothing to gain from risking isolation.

[Question] One infers from your reasoning that the USSR is prepared to intervene every time a friendly government is in danger of falling. This means that limited sovereignty exists in the countries belonging to the Soviet area of influence.

[Answer] Do you not believe that we, who are under U.S. influence, have limited sovereignty?

[Question] Perhaps, but the forms are different, and in any case I condemn this theory of limited sovereignty in both East and West.

[Answer] I am pleased that you do and I can tell you that I have the same stance. But, unfortunately, this condemnation does not alter the facts. You see, the reactions of many nonaligned countries and other democratic, worker and communist forces certainly has had an influence on the USSR. On the other hand, the violent reprisals, the boycotts and sanctions that the United States has adopted against the USSR have exacerbated international relations even further and given the Soviet Union a sense of isolation. That is not the right way to react and does not aid peace at all. Some major Eugopean countries—I am talking mainly about the FRG and France—did realize the danger and have begun working in the right direction, seeking to attenuate the tension. I must lament the fact that the Italian Government has not acted along the same line, despite the presence within it of comrade Socialist ministers whom I would expect to think and act on these issues at least like the German Social Democrats. This is one of the major criticisms that we make of the Cossiga government. [answer ends]

The interview shifts to the topic of real socialism ("The term that I use," Berlinguer explains, "is hitherto realized socialism, because it is only one of the various possible kinds of socialism") and then returns to Poland again.

[Question] Is there still a danger of a Soviet intervention?

[Answer] I hope not. It would be very dangerous if it did happen. But the Polish crisis is certainly not over. A further evolutionary process has been set in motion in that country and for the first time the government and party have agreed to introduce some institutional changes. Now we will see how it works. Great prudence and a great knowledge of historical processes are needed. Errors on either side and in either direction could jeopardize everything. [answer ends]

The conversation shifts to Leninism and Scalfari asks Berlinguer to state what part of Lenin's teaching he still considers valid. They discuss the origins of the workers movement and the Italian workers' movement, the PCI's origins and the Livorno Congress which ratified the Communist-Socialist split.

[Question] Do the reasons which led to that split still exist?

[Answer] Things have changed. A political reunification of the workers' movement is certainly not outside our aims. But we must proceed from the acknowledgement that history has created two parties, the Communist and the Socialist, with different pasts behind them and therefore with different identities—each with its own raison d'etre and its own role to play.

[Question] Antithetical roles? Judging from how things stand, one would think so.

[Answer] One would indeed think so but it is a serious mistake to perpetuate a situation that is damaging to the left and which, particularly at the moment, assists the most stubborn and narrowminded sector of the DC.

[Question] But the PCI and you personally bear great responsibilities for this conflict with the PSI.

[Answer] I do not think so. Certainly not in the trade unions. Our comrades in the Italian General Confederation of Labor have always advocated trade union unity. In local administrations we have always cooperated honestly with the socialists and we would like to extend and consolidate these alliances. We played a decisive role in the election of a socialist to the presidency. Where does our disloyalty lie?

[Questions] The socialists accuse you of failing to support them at the time of the center-left, and of preferential relations, at their expense, with the DC for the 3 years of national solidarity.

[Answer] None of this is true. I would like them to cite one single event or piece of information as evidence of our preferential relations with the DC at the Socialists' expense. As for the center-left, I must point out that when it originated, our position was fairly open. But should we perhaps not have changed it? A rightwing counteroffensive was underway, it was the time of the armed forces intelligence service [scandals] and of the Bank of Italy's savage monetary squeeze. The center-left was transformed: The DC regarded it as a formula for a split within the left....

[Question] And was it?

[Answer] Yes, to an extent it was. The PSI-Italian Social Democratic Party unification itself was conceived with the aim of ratifying a split away from the rest of the left. [answer ends]

Berlinguer continues with this argument after discussing the problems of planning. "The DC has often tried to use the socialist with an anticommunist function or at least to restrain Communist pressure. In short, it has tried to split the left."

[Question] Give me proof of that assertion.

[Answer] Take the following fact: in December 1977, we had government by abstention. A government crisis occurred on our initiative; we believed that that intermediate phase was exhausted and that the time had come to form a government including ourselves. The Socialist leaders made not the slightest commitment to achieve that objective, which verablly they claimed to want very much. The same thing happened again recently, following the 1979 elections. Unless the contrary is proved, I must deduce that the present Socialist Secretariat does not want the PCI to join the government in the least; it accepts the DCI's first veto as a fait accompli.

Pact With Socialists

[Question] Would you be willing to form a pact with the Socialists whereby the two parties would undertake to stay together either in government or in opposition?

[Answer] Most willing. Indeed, look: I will take the opportunity that you have offered me to express a formalproposal in this direction.

[Question] There is now talk of a Socialist prime minister. Is the PCI too lukewarm?

[Answer] We are convinced that the country's problems are not to be resolved through a continuous succession of formulas.... The workers' movement must be represented united in the government and, of course, if the prime minister were no longer a Christian Democrat but a Socialist, it would be a new and important factor. But there can also be a Socialist prime minister of a government that seeks a split in the workers' movement; and that would be a negative factor. Or there could be a Socialist prime minister who believed that because of the very form the government has, the PCI is obliged to guarantee it cooperation a priori, limiting itself to act as its slave. And we would find this unacceptable too.

[Question] A question about the Cossiga government. Is the PCI's opposition not too tough and preconceived?

[Answer] We have judged the government on the facts. The first fact was the Cabinet list. The Christian Democratic ministers were appointed in accordance with the strictest distribution of posts among the currents, while the Socialist left decided it was not worth making an effort.... Then the government presented itself to Parliament without a program; the prime minister said that the economic program would be presented later. We looked at specific actions; the failure to make new appointments to the banks, the blatantly corrupt shaping of the appointments that were made, the economic decrees and the deflationary and recessive policy, the shamefulness of what is happening in the Italian radio and television service and a foreign policy which at best is neutral and passive and at worse is servile toward the West's most extremist currents.

But there was also the following fundamental fact: This government is hindering any possible positive evolution of the political situation with regard to both the country as a whole and the government parties. Have the DC and PSI leftwingers and even Senator Spadolini [PRI secretary] nothing to say about the paradox of a real majority that does exist in the country and within parliament itself but which fails to take definite shape and establish itself for no very clear reason, the fact being that they all claim that the ideological prejudices against the PCI have now been surmounted? There is much talk of governability but what does it mean: That the government manage to survive, come what may, by dint of decrees and votes of confidence (or even one single majority vote) and that from time to time it manages to make a tardy, inadequate or mistaken decision? This is not governability.

[Question] So Cossiga must go. What next?

[Answer] Next, a government that will set the political situation moving again and manage to govern more responsibly.

[Question] You will still be in opposition, but more flexible.

[Answer] Not more flexible! We are not in favor of disguises and if we are in opposition we will fight with determination. Do you remember the Moro-La Malfa government? We did our job in opposition then too, but we did not for instance demand that government's immediate fall because we believed it could help open the way to more advanced solutions. We accepted our role and performed it to the full. We are demanding that the present government go because its continued existence is merely exacerbating the situation and leading the country astray.

[Question] Meanwhile, the trade union fall [period of negotiating new labor contracts] is in full swing and there are some very major unresolved problems such as Fiat. Do you share the trade unions' position?

[Answer] When we do not agree with the trade unions we say so openly, as comrades to comrades. This time we are in complete agreement. You cannot put tens of thousands of workers on the streets just because Fiat is building the wrong models--and that is not its only mistake.

[Question] My last question: Do the party grass roots support the leadership group's line?

[Answer] I believe so. Ours is not a monolithic party. It is a complex party in which differing stances sometimes coexist in both the grass roots and the leadership itself and in which there is debate, sometimes polemical. Our democratic centralism is not in the least based on reducing all the opinions to a single one. It is a rule through whose enforcement we can democratically achieve the party's political unity and guarantee it both in approach and in practical conduct. This is precisely where our strength lies: We do not pursue the policy emanating from the leadership; we are a mass party which is able to continually consult the grass roots and members and make use of their contribution and a party which seeks to interpret their demands and their will.

[Question] I asked you whether the party agrees with the leadership group's line.

[Answer] I have told you that I believe so. The party wants guarantees on three points: 1--That our position of full autonomy and constructive criticism with respect to the USSR does not imply ignoring 60 years of history; 2--That the policy of unity with all the progressive forces does not imply abandoning our class roots; 3--That the development of democracy in our internal party life does not imply the birth of currents and splits. This is what the party and all of us want. Furthermore, we are part of history and with history, we are a major democratic force for change and we ourselves want to regenerate ourselves continuously so that we never fail to meet the challenges of history.

U.S., USSR DELEGATION HEADS SPEAK AT CSCE PREPARATORY MEETING

LD020026 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 2000 GMT 1 Oct 80

[Text] With interventions by the United States and the Soviet Union, the preparatory meeting for the Madrid conference today tackled discussion of the most important subjects for the ordering of work of the principal meeting, which will begin in Madrid on 11 November. Both relate to the timetable of the principal meeting--centered on the content of the proposals submitted at the appropriate time by Spain and Czechoslovakia.

The head of the U.S. delegation, Ambassador Max Kampelman, said that it is now time to tackle the basic subjects and asked the Czech delegation for details of its proposal. Kampelman insisted that until the subject of the timetable is resolved--which is precisely that which has brought the two blocs into confrontation--the other subjects which the preparatory meeting has raised will not be able to be resolved.

For his part the head of the Soviet delegation, Ambassador Yuriy Dubinin, during his intervention on the same subject, also insisted that time--the object of the discussion--was of the utmost importance and expressed the Soviet desire to give explanations to overcome the mistrust which prevails among delegates from the different blocs. The delegation of the Soviet Union--through its spokesman--made a public statement in which it said that, in spite of some progress being made in the discussions, it is necessary to make quicker advances in the work (?and to solve) the deadlock in which the most important subjects of the preparatory meeting are immersed.

ABC REPORTS WARSAW DENIAL OF VISA FOR SPANISH UNION LEADER

LD021243 Madrid ABC in Spanish 1 Oct 80 p 18

[EFE report: "Warsaw Denies Spanish UGT Leader Visa"]

[Excerpts] Madrid-The General Workers Union [UGT] secretary for international relations, Manuel Simon, has been refused entry into Poland without any kind of explanation, according to what the trade union leader himself has told EFE.

The UGT Executive Committee, following a meeting held yesterday, expressed its "vigorous protest" against this action and stated its decision to continue to give support to the free trade union movement in Poland.

Manuel Simon expressed his surprise at this refusal, "at the very time," he said, "when the preparatory work for the CSCE conference, to which Poland belongs, as a signatory of the Helsinki Agreements, is taking place in Madrid." I cannot understand how other people are succeeding in visiting Poland and returning--I am referring specifically," he added, "to the Workers Commissions delegations, which visited Poland not long ago."

EC's JENKINS IN SPAIN FOR TALKS ON EEC NEGOTIATIONS

LD030144 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Roy Jenkins, president of the European Commission, who is in Madrid on a 2-day official visit, has been holding talks throughout the day with various members of the Spanish Government. According to official Spanish sources, these talks are aimed at agreeing on a calender for negotiations between Spain and the EEC. Among the subjects which have been dealt with concretely is the understanding that the final phase of the negotiations cannot begin until the second half of next year and that the negotiations could be settled by the end of 1982.

At the end of the luncheon held in Trinidad Palace the president of the European Commission held talks in private with Eduardo Punset, Spanish minister for relations with the European Communities. After this meeting, Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez received Roy Jenkins at 2022 in Moncloa Palace. Finally the Spanish prime minister hosted a dinner at his official residence for the president of the European Commission.

MADRID'S ABC REPORTS SPANISH-GREEK CONTACTS ON EEC

LD291345 Madrid ABC in Spanish 25 Sep 80 p 21

[Matilde Hermida report: "Kondoyioryis-Punset Talks on EEC"]

[Text] Madrid--"Patience and Persistence" was Greek Minister for Relations with EEC Yeoryios Kondoyioryis' message during the press conference which took place at the Trinidad Palace yesterday, following his working meeting with his Spanish counterpart, Eduardo Punset.

Some 3 months from becoming the Community's 10th country, Greece represents for the Spanish negotiators an interesting interlocutor that could give guidance concerning the complex path toward Brussels.

Mr Punset himself explained that during his meeting with Mr Kondoyioryios he sought to specify the principal difficulties posed by negotiations of this kind and the best way to tackle them, and that in this connection the Greek representative had offered him every assistance.

"According to our experience," Mr Kondoyioryis said, "these negotiations must be tackled with very sound arguments, flexibility and patience in order to surmount the political vicissitudes which arise (elections, incidents and so forth). This patience must never be lost, since you always eventually find the solution for which you are seeking. Nor can you expect the major issues to be resolved while the talks are deadlocked."

Specific Aims

With respect to the specific aims of his visit to Spain, the Greek minister explained that he wished above all to return the visit made by (former minister for EEC relations) Mr Calvo St Oelo to Athens last year. At that time he received an invitation which the present minister had reiterated. "There is no detailed agenda for my visit, although there is one specific issue, which is that of the repercussions on Spanish-Greek relations of the 1970 preferential agreement between Spain and the EEC which will begin to affect them from 1 January of next year."

In this connection the Spanish minister pointed out that Greece is obliged from the moment it joins the EEC to accept all the agreements signed by the Community with third countries. This means that Spain and Greece should study a protocol which will make it possible to surmount possible problems. The protocol with Greece needs to be ready before the end of the year and it does not appear that it will present particular difficulties.

The preferential agreement which governs Spanish-EEC relations stipulates, among other things, tariff reductions of 60 percent for the industrial products which our country exports to the EEC countries and 25 percent--broadly speaking--for the products which we purchase. It also offers advantages of an agricultural nature.

Spanish Strategy

Mr Kondoyiroyis also stated that the entry of Greece and, in due course, Spain will balance the European situation, which is biased at present toward the problems of the so-called northern countries. However, he declared himself opposed to the creation of "groups" within the EEC structure, which should be a whole and not split into sectors or by the countries' individual interests. The Greek minister declined to appraise the strategy followed by Spain in its approach to the EEC; he merely emphasized the support which Athens has always expressed for Spain's entry into the Community. Mr Punset was naturally more explicit, and cited the basic points of Spain's strategy: first of all, to give impetus to the negotiations on "all negotiable matters"; second, to seek the maximum information from the EEC on all the legislative amendments and debates occurring within the community, so that Spain will not be taken by surprise by the EEC's "verdict" on its entry, which will be delivered in June 1981; and third, to develop as far as possible exchanges of information on the major matters in dispute between Spain and the EEC.

EDITORIAL ON HAROLD BROWN'S LETTER ON DEFENSE SPENDING

LD291427 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 22 Sep 80 p 1 p 8

[Editorial: "From Harold to Poul"]

[Text] The two letters from U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown to his Danish counterpart Poul Soegaard, after being private and confidential, have now become public property. Anyone and everyone can now form his own picture of what the American anxieties over the Danish defense forces are all about.

The two letters go into a number of details, which obviously hardly occupy the U.S. defense secretary personally every day but which reflect the U.S. military leaders' preoccupation with how the Western alliance can best defend the Danish straits and the line between Hamburg and the sea.

The central concern in the letters is not in itself the 3 percent annual budget increase, which the NATO nations came to a decision about more than 2 years ago and which has dominated the Danish defense debate for months. The central concern is rather what efforts Denmark is expected to make and indeed must make to contribute to a situation in which U.S.--and other allied--reinforcements could reach Denmark in time, and in which the decision to send these troops and plan their departure would actually really be made.

It is this final point that is the most sensitive. The situation is reminiscent of the one that prevailed in the months before the adoption of the defense agreement at the beginning of 1973. Then, too, the Danish Government was reminded in NATO of the difficulties that would arise in the timely departure and arrival of reinforcements. The backgound was in part the somewhat drastic plans for cuts in defense that were contained in a Social Democratic defense outline, which was, however, subjected to a number of changes in a positive direction in the final defense settlement.

It is quite true that the U.S. defense secretary's two letters represent interference in the Danish defense debate, but they do not represent an interference that we can allow ourselves to be offended by. It is one of the rules of the game for the joint defenses of Western Europe that has applied almost as long as the Atlantic alliance has existed.

What is unusual is the tone of the letters and the use of a formulation such as the following: "Unless Denmark is and is seen to be in a position to fulfill these tasks, I would find it extremely difficult to justify commitments to reinforce Denmark and stockpile materials there to the U.S. Congress and the American people."

The Danish Government has only itself to thank for the use of such words in a letter from one NATO nation to another. It is not only the refusal to accept a 3-percent increase in the 1981 defense budget, but the way in which this refusal has happened which has caused the difficulties that have arisen. It goes without saying that these difficulties will not be removed by the publication of Harold Brown's letters and Poul Soegaard's replies. However, the Danish people, including the governing party's voters and Folketing members, will not be able to harbor any doubts in the future as to how seriously the government's hopefully only temporary decision to stick to a zero-solution for defense is viewed by the United States--and by some of our other allies such as Norway and West Germany.

MINISTER P. SOEGAARD TO SUBMIT 'COSMETICIZED' DEFENSE PLAN

[-JK report: "Soegaard Plans a 5-Year Defense Agreement"]

[Text] Tomorrow Defense Minister Poul Soegaard will present plans for a 5-year defense agreement to the parties normally involved in defense agreements.

The plan seems to confirm the possible course of events surrounding negotiations, which the prime minister himself has indicated may become necessary--that the Social Democratic Party may perhaps try to balance its way through the Folketing with a new defense plan without multiparty support. The defense minister's plan will be a superficial attempt to meet some of the criticisms that other defense settlement parties have made, especially concerning the defense of Sjaelland. However, the plan seems to contain defense cuts that would make it completely unacceptable both for the Liberal and Conservative parties and for the government's two partners in economic settlements, the Center Democrats and the Christian People's Party.

On the controversial question of the defense of Sjaelland, where the government's zero-solution would mean that one of the two brigades at present in the area would have to be cut, the defense miniser now says that the remaining brigade will be split up into two combat groups. But it is not made clear how large these will be and what materiel they will have at their disposal. The plan contains considerable cuts in naval defenses and smaller cuts in air defenses. The defense minister stresses the need to strengthen surveillance activities and the buildup of reinforcements to compensate for the cuts, but Denmark has already made agreements on surveillance activities and started negotiations on the supply of reinforcements. The plan also means that the military installations in Tirstrup and Vaerloese will be "mothballed" and will only be used under special circumstances.

Defense experts have described to BERLINGSKE TIDENDE the minister's revised defense plan as a cosmeticized version of the original zero-solution and a government attempt to strike a balance between the internal party wishes among Social Democrats and Liberals to limit defense spending and a wish to continue the tradition of multiparty defense agreements with broad support.

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE on Defense Cuts

LD021311 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 30 Sep 80 Part 1 p 5

[Lisbeth Knudsen report: "Government Defense Plan Will Weaken Air and Sea Defenses"]

Text] The government states that it is willing to stand by its agreements with NATO on a joint so-called AWACS surveillance system, but at the same time it is planning to cut the air force and navy so drastically, as part of a new defense plan, that military sources express doubts as to whether Denmark would have the capacity to deploy aything against what the AWACS aircraft may discover. The political parties that normally support a multiparty defense agreement will be presented with the government's new defense plan, of which BERLINGSKE TIDENDE was able to publish details yesterday. One of the areas that will be one of the most controversial in the discussions between the parties will be warning and surveillance activities and the drastic cuts in the two branches of the forces. According to the government's plan the air force will be reduced from 112 combat aircraft to 80. In the navy the submarine fleet will be reduced from the present 6 submarines to 3. The submarines, "life" will also be extended, so that modernization can be postponed. The navy will also gradually give up its "Sea-Bear" class units, according to the plan. Activities at the naval station at Korsoer will be reduced considerably. As far as the air force is concerned it is said that activities in Tirstrup and Vaerloese will be abandoned.

As was mentioned in BERLINGSKE TIDENDE yesterday the army will be effected by a strength reduction from two brigades to one on Sjaelland, and according to the minister's proposal this brigade will be split into two combat groups. The defense minister's proposal suffers from a number of deficiencies in definite information about the government's plans. This is true of all areas of defense--including the home guard, of which Defense Minister Poul Soegaard was formerly civilian chief. The proposal however makes it clear that the home guard will have a greater role to play.

LIBERAL PARTY CONGRESS FOCUSES ON DEFENSE ISSUES

LD021531 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 29 Sep 80 Part 1 p 7

[Lisbeth Knudsen report: "Defense Forces Must Live Up to Their Commitments"]

[Text] "The Liberal Party will not accept a defense strategy which would mean that parts of the country would have to be surrendered without a fight." This was the clear promise on defense settlement negotiations, which start tomorrow, made by Liberal Party Chairman Henning Christophersen yesterday at the party's national congress. The Liberal Party defense spokesman, Arne Christiansen, added that the Liberal Party will reject "a thirties-style defense policy, that is, a policy of capitulation."

A large part of the political debate at the Liberal Party national congress at the weekend turned on the defense negotiations that are to start soon. The Liberal leaders called on the national congress not to get involved in a debate on the percentage increase in the size of the defense budget, but instead to fix on some fundamental principles for the defense debate.

"Let us now begin to talk about what is really at stake. Danish defenses must be able to hold out until the necessary reinforcements from our allies arrive. Danish defenses must be able to defend the whole of Denmark. Danish defenses must be able to fulfill their tasks in collaboration with other NATO nations' forces in wartime," the Liberal chairman said at the national congress. He added that this approach had it economic price, but that the Liberal Party would be willing to pay it. All the speakers at the national congress who dealt with defense were in broad agreement on the need for defense spending with at least a 3 percent annual increase, and, ideally, more.

The Liberal chairman also disassociated himself from the expression "Denmarkization". "We do not accept a sneaking policy of neutralization and isolation. On the contrary, we want to expand and strengthen our participation in the Atlantic alliance and the European Community," Henning Christophersen said. He also referred to the situation in Poland and said: "What is happening and has happened in Poland is Poland's own affair, in which no other states should interfere, but perhaps this view is not shared by all. Denmark must learn a clear lesson from these developments. We must cling to our alliances and strengthen them. We must make sure of our allies' and our friends' confidence. We must make sure of our possible opponents' respect for our wish and ability to defend our freedom."

AFTENPOSTEN ADDRESSES FINNS ON THEIR 'CONCERN' FOR NORWAY

[Editorial: "Finland and Norway"]

[Text] Last week's official and unofficial statements on Norwegian security policy to Norwegian journalists visiting Finland have made waves in the press in our two countries. AFTENPOSTEN's editorial last Friday was a special target for Finnish criticism: it was criticism that we can well understand and--as far as a couple of crucial phrases are concerned--also fully accept. In return we hope that our Finnish neighbors are willing to familiarize themselves with and to attempt to understand the security policy situation which will always give rise to Norwegian concern if Finland makes direct initiatives to influence concrete defense and foreign policy decisions in Norway.

It is a fact that three leading Norwegian newspapers--ARBEIDERBLADET, DAGBLADET and AFTENPOSTEN--simultaneously and practically in the same form carried a message to Norwegian public opinion of Finnish "concern" created by the question of contingency stockpiling of U.S. military equipment in Norway. It was a message that came only a day after the government, at a meeting of the Oslo Labor Party on just this question, had in reality suffered a defeat;

For the first time in a long while an impression had been given that Norway was really tottering over an important security policy issue. It does not need much political intuition to predict that in such a delicate situation an expression of opinion--including and unofficial expression--from a friendly neighbor could have a great effect.

We would like to repeat that the Scandinavian balance, and therefore Finland's security, too, is based on the Western alliance's capacity to give military reinforcement to Norway--so that the balance with the Soviet Union's military forces in the north is maintained. This Soviet force is being expanded at a rate that is perhaps not dramatic, but is so steady and persistent that the whole of Scandinavia is faced with the prospect of a power shift that in the long run could have very serious political consequences. The geographical groupings and alliances in northern Europe make Norway the country which can most effectively contribute to the preservation of the old balance in the north, in part through actual military measures and in part through steps of a more political-symbolic nature.

Halfway between these two types of measures come both the plans from the middle of the seventies to allow West German combat troops to take part in maneuvers in Norway in the same way as other allied forces, and now the plans for contingency stockpiling for a brigade of U.S. Marines. After President Kekkonen's intervention Norway abandoned--out of respect for the Finns, according to Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlud--its plans to put the West German troops on an equal footing with those of other allies. We have thus arrived at a situation where Bonn's Ostpolitik serves as an example for Norway, at the same time as Bonn provides the only allied troops which cannot take part in exercises in Norway. If we were now to allow ourselves to be influenced into making comparable decisions on contingency stockpiling for the U.S. Marines, then we would have succeeded in creating friction in the military collaboration with two of our most important allies--and this would not benefit the military balance in the north.

Our Finnish neighbors and friends ought to fully realize that the consideration of Finland's security is an extremely important element in all Norwegian security policy deliberations at a very early stage. A pleasing expansion of Finnish--Norwegian political contacts in recent years has made it even easier for us to understand these consideration. But once the Norwegian plans have begun to take shape, Finnish attempts to exert influence will, however, defeat their goal. Not only can they put strain on relations between our two countries, but they would be an open invitation for Soviet attempts to put pressure on Norway via Finland. Such developments would be most unfortunate for all Scandinavian countries. Their best interests will always be served by Norway--as a part of the western alliance--talking directly with the Soviet Union.

THREE MINISTERS REPORTEDLY PLAN TO RESIGN

LD022250 Stockholm Domestic Service in Sweden 1700 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] Three Norwegian ministers have announced that they intend to leave the Nordli Labor government. They are, apart from Minister of Municipal Affairs Inger Valle, who said a few days ago that she would resign, Energy Minister Bjartmar Gjerde and Justice Minister Andreas Cappelen. All three say that they have been doing the job for so long that they have tired of government work. However, political observers in Oslo speculate that a power struggle in the party is behind the government reshuffle.

EDEK DEPUTY RAISES ISSUE OF U.S. PRESENCE AT BRITISH BASES

NC021813 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Excerpts] The House of Representatives resumed its work this afternoon after the summer recess. At the beginning of the meeting, House President Mikhailidhis referred to the 20th anniversary of the Cypriot Republic and stressed the need to safeguard a truly independent, sovereign and territorially integral Cyprus, which, he pointed out, constituted the guarantee for the survival of all its inhabitants. Mikhailidhis urged everyone to contribute to this objective, calling in particular on the Turkish Cypriots to work with Greek Cypriots for a common and prosperous homeland. Mikhailidhis also paid tribute to those who fell for freedom as well as to the relatives of missing persons, the refugees and all people who have not yielded in the face of tribulations.

During the meeting, Deputy Ambizas informed the House that he had withdrawn from the Democratic Party [DIKO] and that he would act as an independent deputy. At the same time, Deputy Ladhas informed the House that, following a decision by the DIKO chairman and with the consent of the present members of DIKO's parliamentary group, he had been appointed as DIKO parliamentary spokesman in the House.

During the meeting, EDEK Chairman Lissaridhis charged that U.S. aircraft and marines were stationed at the British bases in contravention of the treaty of establishment. Following the speeches of the AKEL and DIKO spokesmen, Papaioannou and Ladhas, as well as the speeches of Deputies Potamitis and Galanos, the House authorized its president to convey the charges to the Ministry of the Interior and brief the body on the issue.

The House president then urged the parliamentary committees to speed up the examination of various bills already submitted to the body.

More on Issue

NC030721 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 3 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Dr Lissaridhis, the socialist EDEK party leader, yesterday raised in the House of Representatives the question of American presence at the British military bases.

There are reports, he said, that there are 15 Phantom aircraft, "Hercules" planes and "hundreds of thousands of American marines". Their presence was connected with the situation in Middle East "and a little further north", he said. Dr Lissaridhis argued that this constitutes a violation of the treaty of establishment under which the bases were ceded to Britain.

The AKEL leader Mr Papaioannou joined in to say that this is not the first time the question has been raised in the house; and another AKEL group member Mr Potamitis said that government replies have been confined to conveying what the British High Commission was saying--that nothing is happening and the Cyprus Government knows nothing.

A written reply from the Minister of Foreign Affairs Mr Rolandhis to questions which had been tabled on the subject by Mr Yiangos Potamitis and Mr Kh. Mikhailidhis said that as far as the Cyprus Government in concerned, the use of the bases will not be allowed for purposes other than for which they had been retained.

FRG REPORTEDLY INCREASING MEDIATION EFFORTS WITH TURKEY

ATO21340 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] The ATHENS NEWS AGENCY reported from Bonn that the FRG government recently increased its efforts to achieve a more conciliatory position from the Turkish Government on the question of Greece's return to the military wing of NATO and on the Cyprus issue.

Authoritative Bonn circles, referring to the efforts of the FRG Government, expressed the hope for a restoration of stability and unity in the Southeastern flank of the Atlantic Alliance.

The same circles added that restoration of this unity is more urgent today due to the Iran-Iraq war and the presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

The same circles said that German recommendations to Ankara are not in the form of pressure but are being made at the ambassadorial level in accordance with instructions from the FRG Foreign Ministry.

On the eve of elections in Bonn, however, representatives of the left wing of the Social Democratic party of Chancellor Schmidt clearly expressed their displeasure over the military coup in Turkey and particularly over violation of human rights. This issue will be brought to the attention of the new government which will emerge from next Sunday's election confrontation.

The ATHENS NEWS AGENCY report also states that the coup in Turkey has supplied new arguments to FRG government personalities, including Minister of Finance Matthoefer, who argue that the 7 to 10 ratio of FRG aid to Greece and Turkey must not be disturbed.

These personalities also argue that Greek-FRG relations must not be disturbed for the sake of Ankara and they urge the FRG government to exercise all its influence upon the Turkish generals so that they may make certain concessions which could lead to a solution of the problems on the southeastern flank of NATO.

ATHENS RADIO REPORTS OFFICIAL U.S. REACTION ON NATO ISSUE

ATO21305 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] The United States attributes great importance to Greece's return to the military wing of NATO, said a State Department spokesman. This statement officially expresses the views of the U.S. Administration in answer to Mitsotakis' statement on the Greek position for the country's return to NATO.

In an interview with the WASHINGTON POST Mitsotakis said Greece will withdraw its request for its return to NATO's military wing if this request is not satisfied within the next few weeks. Mitsotakis also said that at the same time the Greek Government will decide to stop the operation of U.S. bases on Greek territory.

The State Department spokesman said the U.S. Administration was fully informed of the fact that Greece connects the question of its return to NATO to the provision of military facilities to U.S. Armed Forces.

The spokesman added that General Rogers is the appropriate authority for dealing with the issue in his capacity as Supreme Commander of Allied NATO Forces. The U.S. Administration, the State Department spokesman added, considers that NATO has the authority to handle the issue and believes that this offers more hopes for a speedy solution.

TO VIMA CITES U.S. CONCERN OVER 'ANTI-AMERICAN' FEELING

ATO21525 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 2 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The "anti-American" feeling created in Greece by Washington's well-known campaign of threats and pressure aimed at Greece's return to NATO and the preservation of U.S. bases now worries Washington because relations between the two countries are being led into an impasse with repercussions which remain unforeseeable at present.

This new outbreak of "anti-Americanism" and its dangerous effects upon the future of Greek-U.S. relations was underlined in a cable addressed to the State Department by the U.S. Embassy in Athens with particular stress on the reaction caused by the well-known threatening statements to TO VIMA by State Department and Pentagon personalities. After this intervention by the U.S. embassy the State Department undertook to "calm things down" with a lengthy statement from its representative.

The State Department — as reported by our correspondent Stathis Evstathiadhis — in a statement by its representative attempted to counter dispatches and reports in all Athens newspaper which referred to a U.S.-inspired attempt to blackmail the Greek Government into appearing conciliatory on the question of its return to NATO and on the question of operating of U.S. bases in Greece. The State Department spokesman made a particular attempt to disperse "suspicions" that Washington considers the position of the Rallis Government as precarious or that it questions the fact that the policy expressed by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis trully expresses the policy of the entire Greek Government.

An additional proof of the multifaceted activities undertaken by the U.S. side in order to "explore" the Government's intent is to be found in a confirmation of a report published in TA NEA yesterday that U.S. Ambassador McCloskey last Friday visited the secretary general to the president, P. Moliviatis.

It remains certain that during this visit the U.S. ambassador tried to establish whether the policy followed by the government on the NATO issue and on bases has the approval of the president of the republic.

In reference to this visit the secretary general to the president of the republic issued the following statement:

"It is a fact that U.S. Ambassador McCloskey did visit the secretary general to the president of the republic, Ambassador Moliviatis, last week. The visit was purely formal and no basic issue was discussed during this short visit."

On its own part the U.S. embassy also confirmed the visit but described the conversation as "private" adding that since it was private there can be no statement on its content.

The government, in the meantime, has resolved to withdraw its request for its return to NATO and to take over control of U.S. bases if Greece does not return to NATO before the forthcoming parliamentary election.

In an interview with the WASHINGTON POST Foreign Minister Mitsotakis stated that Greece would be "finally and irrevocably" forced to withdraw from NATO if a formula for its return is not found within the next few months. The ASSOCIATED PRESS even reported that Mitsotakis used the words: "within the next few weeks."

The impasse thus created over the NATO issue was also intensified by the statement made tocur correspondent Efstathiadhis by the Turkish ambassador to Washington, Elekoag, who warned (using nearly identical terms as those used in the other day's statement to TO VIMA by a senior official of the Turkish Foreign Ministry) that there will be no change in Turkish policy on the question of Greece's return to NATO who also recommended that Greece "act sensibly" and not ask for a U.S. intervention.

KKE DEMANDS CESSATION OF BARGAINING WITH NATO

AT021550 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 2 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The following statement was released yesterday [1 October] by the Press Bureau of the Central Committee of the KKE as a result of the provocative threats and extortionist acts of the Americans:

"The U.S. imperialists gained courage from the government's insistence to return the country to the military wing of NATO and from its continual withdrawals under their pressure and they now threaten with intervention in the country's domestic political life in their effort to achieve the enclavement of the country with NATO and the preservation-expansion of their bases. U.S. officials thus threatened our country with "unlimited calamities" and with "very hard reaction from within the 'New Democracy' Party" if their demands are not met.

"These statements create a serious political issue for the government:

"1. The various locum tenens personalities within the government's structure and within political life in general must be unmasked and isolated and the foreign-motivated reactionary apparatus must be dismantled.

"2. Our people have given the government no authorization to return our country to NATO. The people know that this return is directed against national independence and democracy irrespective of the conditions for this return and irrespective of whether this will be undertaken before or after the elections. U.S. threats cannot be dealt with through statements or diplomatic maneuvers or through a new cycle of NATO bargaining.

"It is imperative that negotiations with NATO should be stopped immediately, that our country must finally withdraw from it and the bases must be removed from our country. Such a policy will meet with the support of the people and the democratic forces."

I VRADHINI REPORTS CHANGE IN U.S. ATTITUDE ON NATO, BASES

AT301617 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 30 Sep p 2

[From the "Evening" column: "Muskie and NATO"]

[Text] As is inferred, the talks between Mitsotakis and Muskie in New York did not yield positive results. However, they presented one more opportunity to expound frankly and clearly the Greek views on the issue of return to NATO. Seen from this viewpoint, the talks can be considered constructive.

Of course the atmosphere of these talks was not what it should have been; this was due to the sudden change of U.S. policy from optimism to pessimism and from the warmth of a manifested hope to the cold evaluation of an already-known situation. However, it's natural to expect greater stability in evaluations and aims.

The Greek side has clarified at all levels that the issue of Greece's return to NATO is not a bilateral issue but one that concerns the alliance as a whole, and that the issue of the U.S. bases is absolutely linked with Greece's return to NATO. Consequently, those people who believe that they can convince us to the contrary and those who are trying to sweep aside the status that was in force in 1974 for the sake of new arrangements are endeavoring in vain.

After all, the feeling of some allied factors that the opposition would not touch upon the issue of the bases is not a factor of stable calculation concerning the future nor does it justify propaganda "predictions" concerning unknown prospects and situations.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES GIVING AID TO IRAN, IRAQ

TA021121 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] It has been announced that it is out of the question for Turkey to extend military equipment to Iraq and Iran, which are in war, or for Turkey to allow the delivery of such equipment, aircraft or military personnel to those countries over it. A statement issued by the Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General says: Since the beginning of the Iranian-Iraqi clashes, Turkey has advocated the peaceful solution of the conflict between the two countries—who are its neighbors and with whom it has always had neighborly relations—and it has been careful not to adopt an attitude that was biased toward either of the two. Consequently, it is obvious that it is out of the question for Turkey—which has been acting out of a concern to avoid the continuation or expansion of the conflict—to send military equipment to either of the two countries or to allow the delivery of such equipment, aircraft or military personnel over it.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER ON ECONOMIC DISCUSSIONS IN U.S.

TA021520 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Statement to journalists in Washington by State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal, currently attending the joint IMF and World Bank meeting: date not given—recorded]

[Text] This year's meeting is specially important for Turkey. We consider it beneficial to explain, face to face, to our friends and to those who support Turkey, the situation in Turkey in the wake of the operation on 12 September. The meetings were also useful from that viewpoint.

We also had the opportunity to hold various meetings with the administrators of big European and U.S. banks. We explained the economic situation in Turkey during the past 8 months. Our meetings with the IMF and the World Bank have also continued.

I would like to point out that Turkey's economic situation has clearly been explained to the Fund, the World Bank and the OECD countries and they are all satisfied with the course of the economy. There have been great changes in Turkey during these past 8 months. The development of the economic situation is extremely positive. In brief, the rate of inflation has significantly been reduced. In recent months, the inflation rate has decreased from 8 percent a month to 2 percent a month. This is an important accomplishment which many countries have failed to attain over years. Therefore, this stability program will continue. The interested parties, who extend aid to Turkey, that we have spoken to are extremely satisfied with this.

The 12 September operation has not had a negative influence. On the contrary, there are positive results from the viewpoint of maintaining political stability in Turkey. The conviction that there was no other way of solving the problems in Turkey is apparently widespread here among these circles as well.

SECURITY FORCES CATCH KILLERS OF FORMER PREMIER

TA031045 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] The two murderers who killed former Prime Minister Prof Nihat Erim and his bodyguard in Istanbul's Dragos quarter on 19 July 1980 and six terrorists—members of an illegal organization—who planned the incident, have been caught by the security forces. Istanbul Security Director Sukru Balci said that it was established that the terrorists Ahmet Karlangac and Sadettin Guven had killed Erim and his bodyguard.

In a news conference at the Istanbul Security Directorate, the two assailants confessed their crime. Balci announced the names of six other terrorists involved in the assassination. They are: Dursun Karatas, Huseyin Solgun, Murat Karabulut, Muri Eryuksel, Imam Hasan Gurbuz and Baki Altin. Sukru added that Ozden Birgin and Ersin Tezcanli, two other suspects who were involved in the incident, were still being sought by the security forces.

GENERAL EVREN ADDRESSES POPULACE AT AGRI

TA021801 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Excerpt] After observing a military exercise today in Van, General Kenan Evren and the commanders left for Agri. After meeting Agri Governor Enver Kozanoglu, Evren made a speech addressing the people. He said certain people want to exploit the exercises occasionally held by the armed forces in the eastern Anatolia region. Evren noted that these people aim to alienate the people from the Turkish Armed Forces by spreading the rumor that the exercises are held in a bid to intimidate the local population. He said: This handful of traitors cannot isolate us from you. They cannot deprive us of your love. He said a developed Turkey with a population of 50 to 60 million does not suit the interests of foreign enemies and that therefore they wish to destroy the country by dividing it. Evren said the armed forces will not consent to this.

Noting that the real duty of the Turkish Armed Forces is the defense of the country, Evren said: Our additional duty consists of protecting and defending the Turkish Republic, a duty entrusted to us by Ataturk. The armed forces have always intervened whenever the Turkish Republic has been threatened. Thus, the threat is averted. Evren also stated that the armed forces are not (imposing) an authoritarian regime and that they aim to transform the degenerated and deviated democracy into a real democracy.

Evren said teachers are sacred personages in our country. However, some of them condoned the involvement of their students in anarchic incidents. He noted that if parents and teachers cooperate, the country's children would reach a state where they would willingly sacrifice their lives for their country rather than kill each other. Announcing that the armed forces do not intend to remain in power for long, Evren said the normal democratic order would be resumed after the necessary amendments are effected to the constitution and the election and political party laws.

After his speech, Evren inspected the 12th Infantry Division. He will spend the night in Agri and will return to the military area tomorrow to further observe the exercise.

BELGIUM GOVERNMENT REPORTEDLY TO RESIGN

NC041743 Paris AFP in English 1740 GMT 4 Oct 80

[Text] Brussels, 4 Oct (AFP)--Belgian Premier Wilfried Martens had decided to present his government's resignation to King Baudouin, sources said here today.

Mr Martens was received late today by the king to pass on the results of a cabinet meeting, which was seen as the coalition government's last chance to reconcile over the premier's economic programme.

Mr Martens had talks with King Baudouin earlier in the day, but afterwards mad no public announcement and instead returned to the cabinet session, which wound up at about 5:45 pm [Brussels local time].

Sources said after the cabinet meeting that the entire government was to resign.

[Text] Belgium is in crisis. Wilfried Martens offered the resignation of his government yesterday afternoon, but the king is withholding his reply. This will be for 48 hours. The king has already begun his audiences. Last night he saw Mr Tindemans, president of the Christian People's Party; Van Miert, president of the Belgian Socialist Party; De Clerq, president of the Party of Freedom and Progress; and Cools, president of the Socialist Party. During the day the king will receive other party presidents.

It must be recalled that all party presidents of the majority consider that going to the polls would under present circumstances be the worst solution. The least bad, according to Mr Martens, remains a government formed of three parties, a difficult but necessary formula.

Coalition Party Leaders' Meetings

LD052245 Hamburg DPA in German 2058 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn 5 Oct (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt had a talk this evening with the chairmen of the SPD and FDP coalition parties, Willy Brandt and Vice-Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher, on the continuation of the Social Democrat-Liberal coalition. Brandt and Genscher went to see Schmidt in the federal chancellor's office. Politicians of the two parties, headed by Schmidt and Genscher, intend to meet on Tuesday for a coalition discussion of the basic outlines of the planned coalition agreements on the government's program for the next 4 years. This first round of SPD-FDP talks has thus been advanced one day after having been first set for Wednesday. Detailed coalition negotiations between the two government parties are to be held from 26 October.

Comments on Coalition

LD052334 Hamburg DPA in German 2239 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt announced tonight that a coalition policy would be continued. He mentioned primarily the pursuit of military balance, understanding, particularly with the East, and industrial peace at home. Vice Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher said that in spite of his party's good showing, it would not ask for an additional ministry. In the outgoing government, the FDP had four federal ministries.

Officials' Remarks on Election

DW052034 [Editorial report] Bonn ARD Television Network in German at 1700 GMT on 5 October in a special program reported on the initial results of the FRG Bundestag elections. Commenting on the estimates available by 1900 GMT which revealed a majority of votes for the SPD and the FDP, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt in an interview with Ernst Dieter Lueg said that "this is a very significant success for the Social Democrat-Liberal Coalition under Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, enabling it to continue its policy of peace inside and outside our borders."

CDU/CSU Chancellor Candidate Franz Josef Strauss' initial reaction when interviewed by Hans Kressmann, said that the opposition had not reached its goal, that he would remain minister president of Bavaria and that he would not run again for any future Bundestag elections.

In an interview with Gerd Pelletier, Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, speaking on behalf of the FDP, said that his party despite its substantial gains would not claim any additional cabinet seats, because what mattered were not persons but politics, meaning that the FDP would see to it that "Bonn does not pursue socialist politics."

In an earlier interview Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said that his party would now have to work hard to justify the confidence of FDP voters.

Expressing his full satisfaction with the outcome of the elections, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said that the coalition government would now be able to continue unhindered "our policy outside our borders, the policy of military balance in Europe, possibly on the basis of agreements on a lower level and on the basis of understanding with all our neighbors, including those to the East. We will be able to continue unhindered our policy of social peace in the FRG," adding that he was sure that the FRG's neighbors throughout Europe were also satisfied with the outcome of the Bundestag elections, because it meant that "Germany remains predictable."

Schmidt 'Very Satisfied'

LD051906 Hamburg DPA in German 1832 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Bonn, 5 Oct (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, a vice-chairman of the SPD, is personally "very satisfied" with the election results. In a television interview he said: "The coalition, too, can be very satisfied."

The CDU vice-chairman, Alfred Dregger, said that the CDU/CSU had remained the strongest parliamentary party. He blamed CDU/CSU losses on the "discouraging effect of the three-class franchise [referring to the effect of the small party on the contest between the two larger parties] and the infamous incitement" against Franz Josef Strauss. Chancellor Schmidt supported this campaign and "lost much in human and personal terms," Dregger said. In Dregger's view, voters who believed that the CDU had no chance had voted for the FDP.

Strauss' Comments

LD051936 Hamburg DPA in German 1919 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Text] Hamburg, 5 Oct (DPA)--In a first comment on FRG television, Franz-Josef Strauss, the CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship, said the election result was a "pyrrhic victory" for Chancellor Schmidt in view of [words indistinct]. The great problems persist. The CSU polled 58 percent in Bavaria. In Bavaria, politics triumphed over propaganda. Opposition strategy, he said, will not change. Regarding his personal (?role) in politics, he said: "I am and remain premier of Bavaria". As a member of the federal Bundesrat he will continue to speak in Bonn on issues of federal policy.

CDU Chairman Kohl

LD051922 Hamburg DPA in German 1850 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 5 Oct (DPA)--CDU Chairman Kohl regrets that the CDU/CSU [words indistinct] has failed to achieve its aim of winning an absolute majority in the Bundestag. "We remain in opposition," he said. He said that he will remain opposition leader in the Bundestag and will be a candidate for the chairmanship of the CDU/CSU parliamentary party. The CDU/CSU, he said, had proved to be an immensely stable political force.

The CDU/CSU respects the fact that the electroate has put it into opposition. But it remains the strongest parliamentary party. The result was only possible through the 'tremendous defamation campaign' against Franz-Josef Strauss. He, Kohl, will bear the defeat jointly with Strauss and work for the future. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is not a 'radiant election winner'. Votes have moved to the FDP.

SCHMIDT DISCUSSES ARMS LIMITATION, GDR RELATIONS BEFORE ELECTION

LD041854 Hamburg DPA in German 1721 GMT 4 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Berlin, 4 Oct (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has emphasized that foreign policy and cooperation based on equality would have to be continued with the East. Speaking today at the final election rally of the SPD in Berlin before an audience of about 6,000, Schmidt said that in view of the difficult international situation--the Afghanistan war, the problems in the Middle East and the danger of a new arms race--armament would have to be limited equally on both sides through negotiations and treaties. He was proud that he, together with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, had restarted the talks by the great powers on arms limitation.

All attempts would have to be continued to improve cooperation with the GDR. Even following the cancellation of his meeting with Socialist Unity Party of Germany chief Erich Honecker, the GDR is still basically interested in improved relations. The cancellation of the meeting is "no tragedy," Schmidt said. To postpone does not mean to cancel. In this connection he rejected charges that the SPD is trying to loosen Berlin's ties with the West.

PARTY LEADERS PARTICIPATE IN PREELECTION DISCUSSION

DW031153 [Editorial Report] Bonn ZDF Television Network in German in a special nationwide hookup with the ARD Television Network carries a live roundtable debate from 1915 GMT to 2245 GMT on 2 October featuring the top leaders of the four parties represented in the Bundstag. The program, according to the announcer, was taped for subsequent rebroadcast via Eurovision to other countries including Switzerland and Poland. The participants are Chancellor Helmut Schmidt for the SPD; CDU hairman Helmut Kohl, Hans Dietrich Genscher, federal minister and FDP chairman; and Franz Josef Strauss, CSU chairman and CDU/CSU candidate for chancellor. Moderators are Reinhard Appel for the ZDF and Carl Weiss for the ARD.

Near the end of the roundtable relay the two moderators characterize the discussion by voicing regret that, owing to drawn out polemics and invectives, a "long list of questions" of keen interest to the people has been left unanswered, with Carl Weiss flatly declaring: "Your arguments, gentlemen, are not new" and, "surely we could go on discussing the issues all night, but not this way."

Having introduced the participants and explained the proposed rules for the discussion, moderators Weiss and Appel suggest a series of major topics for discussion, starting off with foreign policy issues in general and inter-German affairs in particular. The first speaker on the subject is Helmut Kohl who stresses the CDU's view that Western policy must be the precondition for any Ostpolitik. Kohl says that while the CDU is strictly against the treaties with the East, these treaties are valid and must, therefore, be observed. As for any talks with the GDR he insists that such meetings with the GDR's Honecker, for example, must be prepared so thoroughly that definite results may be anticipated.

Genscher, the next speaker, defends the government's policy of granting credits to East European countries, reiterating that this policy has been minutely coordinated on a European as well as Western basis, and adding that this must not lead to any interference in the internal affairs of other countries through conditions or the like. Genscher also castigates the CDU-CSU for having adopted an isolated position regarding Helsinki and the CSCE.

Strauss denies that anyone in the CDU/CSU has made the abolition of the East German order to border guards to shoot people trying to flee to the West the prerequisite for a meeting between the chancellor and Erich Honecker, and says that despite the euphoric predictions about improvements made by the SPD's Bahr and Brandt, the order to shoot has not only remained in effect but has even been aggravated lately in that GDR border troops have been instructed to make one shot suffice for stopping an escape.

Chancellor Schmidt restates his reasons for cancelling the meeting with Socialist Unity Party of Germany leader Honecker and in general supports what Foreign Minister Genscher said about policies toward the East. Asked by moderator Appel whether he deems a "loosening" of Western policy a precondition for Ostpolitik, Schmidt reiterates his insistence on the absolute necessity of a military balance and the significance of the German contributions, material and moral, to the Atlantic Alliance.

A controversy develops between Schmidt and Kohl when the latter brings up the charge of a "Moscow faction" in the SPD which bolsters Moscow's interests. Helmut Schmidt disagrees with Kohl's charge concerning the retraction several years ago of U.S. plans for the neutron bomb, declaring that it was the U.S. administration which withdrew the plan on its own and that it did not need any foreign prodding.

Upon the insistence of the moderators, the discussion turns to defense and security policies at 2000 GMT, with Foreign Minister Genscher declaring that "we are not prepared to accept any Eastern pressure," which is why the Western efforts must consist of a combination of endeavors for disarmament negotiations and simultaneous defense preparations. Hence, Genscher points out, the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap will be implemented unless the Soviets come around in negotiations. In this context Genscher claims credit for himself and Schmidt, as Schmidt also did later in the discussion, for having shared in persuading the USSR and the United States to begin talking with each other again.

Strauss defends the CDU/CSU attitude toward Helsinki at the time, recalling his public warnings about the forthcoming wars in Angola and Ethiopia. He insists that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and inter-German affairs be discussed at the Madrid CSCE followup conference as well. He analyzes the Soviet interpretation of detente and discusses the Kremlin's global strategy. Strauss says he was one of the architects of the Atlantic Alliance.

Schmidt replies to Strauss by criticising the lack of any sense of proportions as to Germany's importance on the part of Strauss who had claimed that had the CDU/CSU been in power the Soviets would not have invaded Afghanistan. Schmidt repeats that the dangerous situation in late 1979 and in 1980 was even aggravated by the refusal of the big powers to talk with each other, which is why he and French President Giscard d'Estaing deserve credit for having done something about it.

Kohl subsequently refers to the SPD's Moscow faction again, saying that Schmidt would have failed in the Bundestag on two important votes, including the vote on the boycott of the Olympic games, had the opposition not supported him. Schmidt, in reply, says that the CDU/CSU is incapable of consolidating peace and maintaining good neighborly relations.

Strauss restates his arguments about the alternative in Europe, saying that it is not war or peace, but peace in freedom or ending up under Soviet rule. "War in Europe is just as impossible as it is inconceivable," he says, and he notes that the Kremlin, unlike Hitler, is aware of the risks involved in military action against Western Europe, a reason "why the risk must be kept up."

Foreign Minister Genscher asks the opposition representatives what their alternative is to the incumbent government's policies since the CDU/CSU proposes to effect a "change in policy" after it wins the elections. Strauss replies to these questions by stating that peace in freedom can be had only with an Atlantic Alliance capable of functioning, and since NATO currently is not at its best, every effort must be made to restore its effectiveness. Disarmament conferences, Strauss insists, must not be allowed to turn into general "missile palaver," and the MBFR negotiations in Vienna must be continued. While the suggestions of Brandt, Bahr and Wehner concerning the Vienna talks are "unacceptable," Strauss deems the government position as "deserving support." He adds that if other allies need to look after common interests "outside the NATO area," the Germans must make a special effort to relieve them "here."

The security discussion then moves on to a controversy over whether German soldiers might be sent to the Persian Gulf area. Kohl complains that the SPD and the FDP "distort the facts" to discredit the CDU/CSU and, he says that the Federal Government signed a document at the Venice EC meeting providing for outside engagement. Genscher reflects the opposition representatives' remarks and Schmidt again refers to the opposition's lack of sense of proportion in view of its program of "guarantees" for friendly states in the Middle East. "We are friends with Israel and with Saudi Arabia," Schmidt says. What would happen if they clashed? "Should we support both?"

Schmidt continues by explaining that differences of opinion are bound to occur among friends. Germany has become a partner of the United States which advocates its own interests, he says. He again asks the CDU and CSU representatives to state what alternatives they have in mind when they speak of "changes" to be effected in FRG policy. He concludes by saying that Strauss is a troublemaker [unruhestifter] on a domestic as well as international scale.

Kohl explains that the CDU/CSU wants a "broader" European policy and not just a close German-French collaboration and separate courses of action. He admits to problems between the CDU and the CSU which, however, are by far not as "great as the differences between segments of the SPD."

Genscher then says that Strauss is trying to capitalize politically on the victims of the recent Munich bombing. In response to a question by moderator Weiss, Genscher explains the current "constitutional reality" in the Federal Republic. He notes the CDU domination in the Bundesrat--and thus in the Laender--and calls for an SPD-FDP majority in the Bundestag--and thus the title to the government--to prevent the CDU/CSU from totally dominating the Federal Republic since the current federal president is from the CDU as well.

Strauss restates his charges against Interior Minister Baum, saying that Baum irritated security organs and intelligence services when he held a TV discussion with a former terrorist while cancelling a lecture to a police meeting. In this connection Strauss declares his rejection of any radicalism, right or left, and suggests that the "wehrsportgruppe Hoffmann," the rightist extremists thought to be responsible for the Munich bombing, is infiltrated by "people who have come from the GDR."

PRESIDENT BONGO OF GABON TALKS WITH GISCARD D'ESTAING

LD031319 Paris LE MONDE in French 2 Oct 80 p 5

[Unattributed report: "Our Two Countries Have Been Engaged in Intensive Cooperation for 20 Years"]

[Text] Gabon President Bongo who arrived in Paris on Tuesday 30 September for a 4-day official visit, was to have talks at the Elysee this Wednesday with Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Zaire President Mobutu during a working breakfast. The Zairian head of state is making a private visit to France after attending the UN General Assembly in New York and he had already been received at the Elysee on 11 September.

President Bongo, who had an initial one-on-one meeting with Mr Giscard d'Estaing on Tuesday afternoon, discussed African problems in general with Mr Giscard D'Estaing. While hoping to leave the Zairian president to convene the meeting, the Gabon head of state advocates a conference of central African states to try and achieve a negotiated settlement of the Chad crisis.

At the dinner given in Mr Bongo's honor at the Elysee on Tuesday evening, Mr Giscard d'Estaing proposed a toast, stating: "Your visit is stamped by the friendship and detente which has always governed relations between our two countries.... Our two nations have been engaged in intensive cooperation for 20 years based on mutual understanding of our respective problems and a just assessment of our respective needs."

The president of the French Republic then payed tribute to the "energetic action" being taken by the Gabon president to ensure that the "African Continent takes part in international debates on development problems," and to his positive contribution to the search for peace in Africa. On this subject Mr Giscard d'Estaing stressed that the situation in Chad cannot be settled by arms.

For his part the Gabon president hailed Mr Giscard d'Estaing as the man who has "strengthened and consolidated" cooperation between the two countries. He proposed that France and Gabon should set up a grand joint cooperation commission responsible for "monitoring the implementation of all agreements reached between the two countries and to regularly make qualitative and quantitative assessments of that cooperation."

On Thursday the French president and his Gabonese counterpart will have a second one-on-one meeting which will then be expanded to include members of the two governments and will relate to both bilateral relations and international affairs. It is generally thought that the conflict between Iran and Iraq will be discussed on that occasion since Gabon is a member of the Islamic Conference.

Comments on Oil Price Hike

AB021638 Paris AFP in English 1557 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 2 Oct (AFP)--Certain oil-producing countries will probably take advantage of the gulf war between Iran and Iraq and demand further increases in the price of oil, visiting Gabonese President Omar Bongo said on French radio today.

President Bongo, whose country is a member of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) and the Islamic Conference, urged that consuming countries should not be asphixiated. Oil prices needed amending, in particular as they were based on the U.S. dollar, but any changes should only be brought in after negotiations between producing and consuming countries, he said.

Details of Joint Communique

AB031734 Paris AFP in French 1434 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 3 Oct (AFP)--President Valery Giscard D'Estaing and President Omar Bongo have, in a joint communique issued in Paris on Friday at the end of the official visit to France of the Gabonese head of state, affirmed their attachment to the fundamental principles of the United Nations' Charter and their confidence in dialogue and negotiations to prevent and settle disputes and conflicts between countries while analyzing the causes of current international tensions.

The two heads of state recalled their special interest in the negotiations on disarmament and in the North-South dialogue. They expressed the wish that the current discussions in the United Nations would lead quickly to a more equitable international economic order.

Concerning the situation on the African Continent, the two heads of state recalled the need to leave Africans to settle their own problems without external interference, adding that resorting to African organizations remains the best way to resolve internal or international conflicts on the continent.

On the situation in central Africa, the presidents observed that stability and peace prevailing in that region could be threatened by the fratricidal war going on in Chad and reaffirmed their wish to see the conflict settled among the interested parties under the auspices of the OAU. Meanwhile they expressed their happiness at the peace initiative taken by the president of the Republic of Togo.

Concerning southern Africa, the two heads of state, while expressing their joy over Zimbabwe's accession to independence, wished that Namibia also would attain her national sovereignty as quickly as possible. They expressed their opposition to apartheid and racial segregation, and hoped to see equality of all communities established in South Africa.

On the bilateral front, the joint communique stresses the previleged nature of the relations between Gabon and France, recalling that the two parties on Thursday signed an agreement establishing a Franco-Gabonese joint commission for cooperation. To this end, the communique adds, the possibility of rapidly concluding a general cooperation agreement and updating a cultural, scientific, technical and economic accord will be studied. The two parties also signed a social security accord. France will continue to support Gabon's major economic aspirations in the investment sector and more specifically in agriculture and fishing, mineral exploitation and forestry as well as infrastructure development such as the trans-Gabonese [railroad], the communique emphasized.

Franco-Gabonese economic days will be organized next November to study the further development of exchanges between the two countries.

Signing of Agreements

AB030913 Paris AFP in French 1731 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 2 Oct (AFP)--President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and President Omar Bongo of Gabon signed a joint communique marking the end of the Gabonese head of state's official visit to France on Thursday afternoon following private discussions on international and bilateral relations.

After the signing of the communique, which took place at the Elysee Palace, two agreements were also signed. The first of these, establishing a Franco-Gabonese Joint Grand Commission, was signed by Mr Robert Galley, the French minister of cooperation, and Mr Martin Bongo, the Gabonese minister of foreign affairs and cooperation. The second agreement relates to social security and was signed by Mr Martin Bongo and Jean-Francois Poncet, the French minister of foreign affairs.

President Bongo, who will leave France on Friday, had expressed his desire to establish this Joint Grand Commission on Wednesday, stressing that it would give him the opportunity to examine the agreements linking the two countries. The first meeting should take place next year in Gabon, presumably in February.

The social security agreement affords the two countries the possibility of having their nationals work in either country covered by their respective social security systems. It also makes provisions for Gabonese nationals to enjoy health care in France, even though they work in their own country.

Throughout this official visit, relations between the two countries have been described as excellent and President Bongo, whose country is a producer of oil and uranium, assured France that he is ready to increase Gabon's oil exports in case the crisis resulting from the Iran-Iraq conflict should worsen. Gabon produces about 10 million tons annually. For the moment, France receives 2 million tons of this output.

President Bongo has already discussed the situation in Chad with Mr Giscard d'Estaing at a breakfast in which Zairian President Mobutu Sese Seko also took part when he came to Paris on a private visit. A meeting of the heads of state of central Africa should be held in Gabon soon to try to restore the cease-fire in Ndjamena.

President Bongo will end his official visit on Friday at noon with a press conference. The joint communique will be published on this occasion. On Thursday morning, President Bongo laid a wreath on the tomb of the unknown soldier. He then proceeded to the town hall, where he was received by Mr Jacques Chirac.

Bongo Press Conference

AB031712 Paris AFP in English 1548 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 3 Oct (AFP)--Visiting Gabonese President Omar Bongo has asked France to organise a Chadian peace conference here in Paris based on the British peace initiative that brought independence to war-torn Rhodesia.

Britain gave the different sides in the Rhodesian bush war a suitable framework within which they could work, he told a news conference here at the end of a four-day official visit. There was a cease-fire, followed by elections, he said, adding: I believe France could do the same thing (for Chad) in Paris. Mr Bongo, who put the idea to President Valery Giscard d'Estaing during his visit, said the French president would think about it and reply at an appropriate moment.

The Gabonese president said that central African heads of state could themselves meet in Libreville to discuss Chad should a peace initiative by Togolese President Gnassingbe Eyadema on the former French colony fail. This new initiative--bringing together Congo, the Central African Republic, Gabon, Zaire, Cameroon and Chad itself--could run parallel to any French initiative, he added. President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire, who first announced the move during a stopover here Wednesday, had the job of making the necessary contacts for such a meeting, he said.

The Gabonese president told newsmen today that numerous officials from Chad's eleven politico-military factions, despite their public support for the withdrawal of French troops, privately wanted France to stay and help bring about a cease-fire. He also indirectly reproached countries bordering on Chad--he named Libya, Nigeria and Sudan--for each backing one or other faction.

Mr. Bongo, turning to his official visit here, said France had asked Gabon to sell it more oil to make up for possible supply shortages stemming from the gulf conflict between Iran and Iraq. We agree to this. We will sell you more oil than we sold in the past, he said.

But, while he rejected the view that oil should be used as a weapon to asphyxiate consuming countries, he warned that producing countries would be forced to increase prices while the dollar was hit by stagflation.

In a joint communique issued at the end of the visit, Mr. Bongo and Mr. Giscard d'Estaing recalled their special interest in disarmament negotiations and the North-South dialogue between rich and poor nations. They also recalled the need for Africa to settle its own problems free from outside interference. The communique noted the threat to Central African stability posed by the six-month civil war in Chad and restated the desire of the two presidents to see the conflict settled by the interested parties themselves under the auspices of the Organisation of African Unity. It also expressed hostility to apartheid in South Africa and noted the presidents' desire to see equality for all the different communities there.

President Bongo told newsmen at his press conference that his country would continue to apply austerity measures brought in to help [words indistinct] of the oil boom. He said he had not come to Paris to ask for favours but he noted that Gabon did want France to help finance a second phase of the trans-Gabonese railway, work on which is expected to start in 1983. Mr. Giscard d'Estaing, when he was Finance Minister in 1973, put up French Government money to help launch the project which when completed will link Libreville with the landlocked mining region of Franceville in the south east of Gabon.

PCI'S PAJETTA COMMENTS ON PROPOSED CP MEETING IN BERLIN

LD031449 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 2 Oct 80 p 18

[Unattributed report: "Communist Parties' Study Session in Berlin"]

[Text] Rome--Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta, PCI leadership member and international section chief, made a statement to ANSA yesterday about information leaked in the past few days on the convening of an international communist parties' conference in Berlin this month. Pajetta stated that "the Socialist Unity Party of Germany [SED] has invited the communist parties and numerous liberation movements to a meeting in Berlin, which, the invitation stresses, will be a study meeting.

"We do not know the names of the parties and movements invited and, "Pajetta added, "on this occasion, in accepting the SED's invitation in the form in which it was sent to us, we felt it would be useful for our party to be represented by an expert in the questions mentioned, Comrade Giuliano Procacci, a senator and professor of contemporary history at Florence University. Our comrade will contribute his research and analyses, explaining and illustrating our party's stances autonomously drawn up within its leadership and study bodies. The questions to be discussed will relate to the new international system, the independence, autonomy and sovereignty of each country and people within the framework of international detente and cooperation, and an analysis of imperialism in the contemporary period. Joint documents and stances are notplanned and, in any case, could not be approved by us.

"We think an exchange of information and opinions might be useful," Pajetta concluded, "similar to past exchanges, in other countries and in Italy, organized by our party's study bodies; but at the same time we express the firm conviction that in a meeting of this type no judgments should be expressed on communist parties, working class parties and liberation movements which are not invited or present and hence not able to take part in the debate."

An ANSA dispatch from Paris devoted to this conference--which will take place from 21 to 24 October--referred to the opinion expressed by "circles close to the PCF" which also specified that this will be merely a working meeting among experts on the subject of the "new international system."

Meanwhile in Brussels, Belgian Communist Party National President Louis van Geyt also issued a statement to ANSA on a meeting to which 21 communist parties from European capitalist countries have been invited and which will take place in the Belgian capital on 8 and 9 October. "We want to carry out an exchange of information, experiences, and opinions on the socio-political situation in the various countries, on the assessment of the process of European integration, on the possibility of stepping up the struggles against the crisis and against policies which make the workers alone pay the price of the crisis," he said. "We hope," Van Geyt added among other things, "to have a very open and useful meeting; there will be free discussion without any joint introductory document being submitted and without a joint final document being drawn up."

Cunhal Hits at Ruling Group's 'Intimidation'

LD060926 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0318 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Excerpts] [Unidentified reporter] At 0200 today the United People's Alliance [APU] held a news conference here at the Gulbenkian Foundation. Alvaro Cunhal accused the Democratic Alliance of controlling the news media.

[Begin Cunhal recording] The results of these elections show very well how an antidemocratic government has been capable of resorting to the powers it has enjoyed by virtue of being in office in order to prevent the free expression of the people's will.

All the signs are that the final results will show a majority for the parties of the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government in the Assembly of the Republic, that is to say, these parties will have the institutional legitimacy for forming a new government. All signs point to such an outcome of the elections. This shows full well how a government in office, with the state machine at its disposal, with public money at its disposal, and lacking in democratic scruples, can achieve election results that misrepresent the will of the Portuguese people.

I would like to emphasize the demagogic nature of many measures taken by the government, and also the acts of pressure and intimidation that continued on polling day itself. There have been numerous instances of pressure, acts of intimidation, acts of physical aggression, at the polling stations themselves against APU delegates.

No doubt these results signal a new, difficult phase for Portuguese democracy, but we have great confidence in our people and in the democratic institutions, and we know that hundreds of thousands of Portuguese voted for the Democratic Alliance because they allowed themselves to be deluded. However, their delusions are bound to be short-lived because reality will show how right we were in our warnings.

I would like to point out, now that--I think--we are on television and have the opportunity of contacting the Portuguese people through television, that the APU was given no access to the many televised debates that were held, was given no opportunity to explain to the Portuguese people, by going into their homes as television does, the meaning and scope of the policies pursued by the government.

By using and abusing the state-owned news media, by resorting to all manner of lies and demagogy, the government used its power to achieve a result that does not reflect the will of our people. A democratic force as important as the APU was not allowed to take part in the televised debates, was not allowed to explain to our people the true meaning of the government's policy, of the elections themselves and their implications.

The conclusion, therefore, is that there is a difference between, on the one hand, a result achieved under antidemocratic conditions, pressures, deceit, illusions, which virtually seems to confirm a parliamentary majority for the reactionary alliance also known as the Democratic Alliance and, on the other, the will of the Portuguese people not to return to the situation that existed on 24 April [1974].

We are profoundly convinced that many old-age pensioners, many senior citizens, many unfortunates, many small- and medium-tenant farmers pressured by the rich landowners, many small farmers hoping for a plot of land--that many people who allowed themselves to be deceived and cast the wrong vote do not wish a return to the conditions before 24 April.

We are profoundly convinced that the Portugal of April and the freedoms attained--the gains of the Portuguese revolution--are very deeply rooted in the hearts of our people. Hence our confidence that the Portuguese people, within the framework of the institutions and of democratic legality, will successfully defend the Portugal of April, and our confidence that we shall continue to live in a democratic regime in spirt of the antidemocratic policy of the present government and in spite of what is bound to be the foreseeable majority of the reactionary parties in the Assembly of the Republic. SA CARNEIRO CRITICIZES PRESIDENT EANES' LOVE FOR POWER

LD060843 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 1 Oct 80 p 23

[Alberto Miguez interview with Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro: "Sa Carneiro: 'Eanes Does Not Believe in Party System'"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Excerpts] Evoro, 30 September--For 2 exhausting days I have accompanied the Portuguese prime minister through the Algarve and the Alentejo. [I have talked with him] in his car--which he drives at a dizzying speed--in a small aircraft, returning to Lisbon, during lengthy after-dinner conversations and during several strolls, surrounded by enthusiastic crowds and sometimes insulted by hostile groups, [Sa Carneiro was] impassive, polite, frank. [He spoke] with incisive sincerity, without reserve or [delivered] obliging "off the record" statements, trusting his interlocutor's good judgment, but above all [remained] confident about his arguments. This was the first time that a foreign journalist had penetrated the "Senhor Doctor's" election "high command," and although there could have been reasons of long-standing friendship for this, a determined resolve to explain some things underlay this lengthy dialogue.

I Do Not Love Power for Power's Sake

"Many people wonder how it is possible," he said at one point, "for me to be here as prime minister of Portugal, after so many death certificates signed by opponents and... friends." "The matter is relatively simple. In the first place, the image of fragility which I have perhaps presented so far does not correspond to reality. The secret lies in the fact that I do not love power for power's sake; it does not interest me. So when I was not exercising leadership, that was no tragedy; not even a frustration."

"When we formed the Democratic Alliance, some people burst out laughing" 'It will not last even a fortnight. With the character that Sa Carneiro has, [Social Democratic Center Party Chairman] Freitas do Amaral will break off the agreement.' Exactly the opposite happened. The agreement worked well from the start and is continuing to work perfectly. My character was not as unpleasant as some people imagined, and we have succeeded in working as a team, although I have my own habits, my methods and, undoubtedly, my preferences."

"You are surprised by the bitter and acrimonious tone of the election campaign. I am not. And God knows that we did not cause it. The insults will end up by harming those who invent them. There will be a boomerang effect."

"Everybody against Sa," might be the watchword. He has been accused of an unpaid and fraudulent bank debt. His uncompleted divorce has been recalled in a scandalized tone which would make a Carthusian turn pale. No stone has been left unturned to find 'evidence of criminality' and then to broadcast it from the towers of the Marxist press.

"The Communists are making a mistake, through overreaching themselves, with the story of my alleged debt. They persisted so much and uttered such wild slanders that in the end nobody believed them. What surprised me was the response found in the Socialist camp by these insults and the fact that [Socialist Party Secretary General] Mario Soares has been prepared to support them.

"My Differences With President Are Profound"

"Oh, Mario Soares is a nice person; he has a way with people, it cannot be denied. But he lacks lasting viewpoints. He easily forgets what he did and said the previous day. He has the worst memory in Portugal. He was my opponent, but he is not my enemy. Only a few months ago he invited my wife and myself to dinner at his home. It was a very pleasant evening, and it was made clear that despite the fact that our political stances are very different we would not take our differences into the personal field. He must have forgotten that, too, because he is now supporting with surprising enthusiasm the campaign of slanders launched bythe Communists, so that from being a political opponent I have become a swindler and an adulterer.

"Soares' problem, although he does not believe it now, could lie in his amazing support for General Ramalho Eanes' presidential candidacy. That morganatic marriage will not work, even though the current president may make 'Socialist Front' propaganda on television. Eanes does not belive in the party system."

"Perhaps Eanes believes that my problem with him is personal--one of lack of understanding and individual communication, but he is mistaken. The reasons are deeper and more profound. Of course, I do not get along with the president on a personal level, among other reasons, because he is very difficult and our characters are antagonistic, but the matter is more grave and more profound. Eanes is imbued with a certain idea of his mission, as if he were a De Gaulle. He covets power; he does not wish to share it. He is fascinated by the intellectual fancies of a leftist military man--a member of the Council of the Revolution. He distrusts almost everybody, and the political blueprint which he offers and upholds is contrary to ours. On the other hand, our relations are formally correct: 'please take a seat, Mr Prime Minister;' 'many thanks, Mr President.' Nothing more. We meet every week, without my yielding an inch or he, either. When the ice could have been broken and our relations humanized, it was not possible to do so. Now it is too late."

"Perhaps you are right in saying that the president and I myself are the only protagonists of Portuguese politics. But is this good or bad? Our candidate in the presidential elections--General Soares Carneiro-- is not very well known, I agree, and he is a refined and sensitive intellectual--something which, according to you, will not help his chances, either. I do not agree with such an assessment. He is a good candidate--the most civilian of all the military personnel; and his opportunity will come after our victory in the legislative elections. We are going to win, we are going to increase our previous polls. We are going to exceed 46 percent of the votes cast, and we will remain in the government for another 4 years.

"What will happen if we win now and lose in the presidential elections? I have already told you once and now repeat it: Neither Freitas do Amaral nor I myself will be in the Democratic Alliance cabinet. We will go into parliament to promote the revision of the constitution. We will not throw in the sponge."

In Favor of Spain's Entry into NATO

"It is clear to the Democratic Alliance that Portugal's destiny is Western and European in the external field, just as it is liberal and reformist in the domestic economic field. We are in solidarity with our allies, and we have demonstrated this in all instances. Of course, I do not agree with certain Portuguese military personnel who view Spain's entry into NATO with distrust. This is an issue on which the Spanish people must decide and in which I do not wish to become involved, but there is not the slightest reservation on our part.

"Spain is a European, Western and Atlantic country, and its possible presence in the alliance would not devalue our strategic role in any way. I have said and I repeat," Sa Carneiro reaffirmed, "that the Soviet Union is the only active and determined imperialism today. Our relations with the Soviets are not bad--simply neutral. We have rejected a cultural agreement because of the invasion of Afghanistan, and we have expelled certain overly inquisitive diplomats. When I informed the Soviet ambassador of the expulsion, he asked me several times over: 'Does President Eanes know about this decision of yours?' Of course, the decision did not rest with the president."

"There are no major problems with our former African colonies. I would say that our relations now are better than under other governments--whether socialist or formed 'at the president's initiative.' Only 2 days ago I received the Mozambique minister of health, who is the first minister of that country to visit Portugal since independence. It was a friendly meeting which foreshadows closer cooperation in all fields. An interesting process of political correction, which will undoubtedly facilitate matters, is taking place in Mozambique. Relations with Guinea and Cape Verde are also improving although to some extent there are insurmountable problems. The prediction that 'the rightwing government' would freeze relations with the former colonies has not been fulfilled."

"You ask me what is the future of democracy in Portugal. The future will be at stake in a week's time. If we win--and we will win, make no mistake about it--we will move ahead with the rebuilding of this country, conducting a state policy, not a party policy. We will increase retirement pensions--we have already done so, construct more homes and reduce inflation and unemployment, as we have done over the last few months, and as the figures show. If our opponents win, we will revert to our old ways": A government every 6 months, ambiguity in economic policy and social instability. And continuation of the politico-military setup, so dear to General Eanes, with a Council of the Revolution rechristened with another name. It is not a matter of 'me or chaos,' of course, but the process of democratic stabilization in Portugal depends on our victory."

BASQUE LEADER COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH CENTRAL GOVERNMENT

LD041808 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 4 Oct 80

[Report on interview with Carlos Garaicoetxea, prime minister of the Basque government, by unidentified correspondent--passages within quotation marks recorded--venue and date of interview not specified]

[Excerpt] The prime minister of the Basque government of the Basque country, Carlos Garaicoetxea, had a working breakfast with national press journalists and afterwards another with correspondents from the Basque country to report on the talks held over the past 2 days between representatives of the central and Basque governments. The agenda's principal subjects were Basque radio and television, economic agreements, the economic crisis in the industrial sector in the Basque country, autonomous police and Basque schools. Garaicoetxes commented on the outcome of the talks:

[Garaicoetxea] "I would have to describe the outcome as partially successful--some problems have been resolved and others have been left, pending negotiations at next Wednesday's meeting of the mixed commission on transference of power from the central government to the Basque government. We reached an agreement concerning radio and television--fundamentally television. We resolved the problem of the Basque schools. An important formula has been found--it was formalized in a royal decree at yesterday's Cabinet meeting--to find ways of financing the nonintegral iron and steel industry, which is one of the critical sectors at present afflecting the Basque country. The problem of autonomous police and the problem of economic agreements have been left for further discussion. I can truthfully say that we have clarified many points and we have made progress in our discussions, although there are still important aspects waiting to be resolved.

[unidentified questioner] "Take one thing at a time--the Basque schools.

[Garaicoetxea] "Agreement has been reached so that Basque schools which are in the nature of state schools--those which might be taken under the control of the Basque government--shall receive financing equivalent to that of public state schools. To this effect a budget of 2,080 million pesetas is established for the current year and this will have a logical sequel next year.

[Question] "What is the agreement on radio and television? [Garaicdetxea] "It has been agreed that within 1 month Spanish television will submit a technical plan, an economic study and a timetable to move toward the installation of the autonomous community's own television channel, which could be operating in the second half of 1982. Without prejudice to this, it has been agreed that Radiotelevision Espanola [RTVE, Spanish State Radio and Television] will, from the end of this year, in accord with the Basque government, increase its programs specifically for the Basque country, to approximately 20 hours a week, without prejudice to the possibility of these hours being increased as technical conditions and financial consideratins permit, and also in terms of the production or coproduction which the autonomous community might eventually contribute. Agreements with Spanish television regarding such an increase would be established."

This is what Garaicoetxea said about the economic agreements:

[Garaicoetxea] "There was a meeting, a tense meeting, on this subject yesterday and a reciprocal approach has been left pending, an approach formed yesterday on the points of discussion on the law of economic agreements which, if I am not mistaken, will be answered next Tuesday."

Referring to autonomous police the Basque prime minister recognized that it is a complicated subject, and added:

[Garaicoetxea] "It has to be recognized that this is not an very easy problem and and consequently it has been left pending further discussion (until) next Wednesday, when the matter will again be discussed".

SUAREZ' REMARKS ON REGIONAL AUTONOMY NOTED

LD050324 Madird Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 4 Oct 80

[Diego Armario report on Spanish Prime Minster Adolfo Suarez' 4 October press conference: passages within quotation marks recorded]

[Excerpts] In connection with the subject of Andalusian autonomy, Prime Minister Suarez said the following: [Suarez] "Certainly the govenrment defends the thesis of Article 151 in Andalusia [constitutional provision for rapid transfer to local autonomy] [words indistinct] and has made quite clear its wish to unblock this process, which requires resorting to Article 144 as an instrument which makes the development of autonomy in Andalusia by means of Article 151 viable."

[Armario] Within this area of autonomy development, Prime Minister Suarez gave an analysis of the talks he has had over the last few days with the Lendakari Garaicoetxea, saying that they had reached important agreements and if they had not reached total agreement on economic aspects and on the subject of autonomous police force, it is because of the complexity of the development of the Guernica statute itself and also because there were divergent views on certain somewhat ambiguous subjects. In connection with Catalonia, and the pact with Covergencia I Unio, he said that this pact could be durable and would give parliamentary stability to the government. He added that there are important economic and autonomous objectives for the Catalan minority. In connection with the new form of the new state of the autonomies. He described it as cooperative solidary, autonomous, but in no way federal.

Relative to the subject of the autonomies, specially with to subject of the Basque country, Prime Minister Suarez referred to the cooperation between Spain and France to eradicate terrorism, saying that ETA has in the past, perhaps, an image of an organization struggling for the freedom of an oppressed people, but now Spain is a people with a perfectly good state of democratic rights and if these conditions existed in the past they no longer exist. He said that ETA is a criminal terrorist organization which only commits murder and that the difficulty with France is perhaps that the extradition treaty which was signed by both countries long ago does not meet the requirements of the present situation. He also said that Spain, and the government specifically, will never negotiate with ETA.

[Suarez] "The government has made its position very clear: It will never negotiate with ETA, it will never negotiate with ETA. Of course it must be fought, as the government is doing, withstanding great pressures at all levels, but the government must fight it with more efficiency in the pursuit of crime and with greater capability to thwart it. Parallel to this, with political means, the measures are to implement in depth the Basque autonomy statute."

[Armario] The prime minister was also asked at the press conference whether he agrees with Lendakari Garaicoetxea's statement this morning that the KAS [Basque radical left minimum program] is an alternative acceptable to any democrat. Adolfo Suarez's reply lasted 3 seconds:

[Suarez] "Well, in that case, it can't be very democratic, because I don't agree with it."

DENMARK

BERLINGSKE OUTLINES PROJECTED DEFENSE CUTBACKS

LD031555 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 1 Oct 80 Part 1 p 1

[Christian Broendum report: "All Defense Forces Will Be Reduced"]

[Text] As expected, the main contents of Defense Minister Poul Soegaard's outline for a new defense plan to run to 1985 amount to reductions nearly everywhere in the defense forces. The cuts affect both combat units and the support structure, but the defense minister has tried to spare combat units as much as possible.

As far as manpower is concerned, the cuts affect the army most, especially on Sjaelland, where forces will shrink from 8,300 to 6,500. One of two brigades will disappear, and the remaining brigade will be formed into two combat units.

The outline also makes it clear that Sjaelland will have to make do with the old Centurion tanks, although these will be modernized. The installation of laser range-finders is likely here.

Two barracks on Sjaelland will be cut. The defense command has already indictated that Voldingborg and Holbaek barracks are the likely victims.

The navy will not be given any replacement for the old Sealion-class motor torpedo boats, nor for the cable minelayer "Langeland" and two Sund-class minesweepers. Coastal Fort Langeland and the Stevn coastal artillery will be closed down, but the navy will receive 4 of the 8 helicopters it was promised in the 1973 defense settlement, and 3 new submarines to replace 6 old ones.

The air force will also be cut, in that the old F-104s will be scrapped as they become obsolete. However, there will be an investigation to see if their lifetime can be extended. There will be no replacement for the Nike missile system when it disappears over the next few years, and, as well as reductions in activities at the air force bases at Tirstrup and Vaerloese. A further three air force bases will be closed.

The defense minister's proposal says nothing about definite plans for the expansion of Danish NATO stockpiles.

Comment on Government Proposals

LD060853 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 1 Oct 80 p 5

[Christian Broendum report: "An Unworthy Defense Solution"]

[Text] "The government has put forward an unworthy defense solution." This was the conclusion of Palle Simonsen, Conservative defense spokesman, after the first meeting yesterday in a new series of meetings between the government and the parties normally participating in defense plan settlements--the Social Democrats, the Liberals, the Conservatives, the Christian People's Party and the Center Democrats--plus the Radical Liberal Party, which did not support the current defense plan settlement.

The government published its proposal for a new settlement after the meeting with the parties; it includes a 15-percent reduction in army personnel compared with the 1973 strength targets, while the reduction is only 10 percent in comparison with actual army strength today. However, the cuts have a broad effect within the defense forces.

After the meeting Defense Minister Poul Soegaard stressed that he had tried to make the reductions primarily in support units rather than combat units, although some reductions in combat units were unavoidable. Poul Soegaard stressed that some equipment will undergo qualitative improvement, and also that special importance had been attached to early-warning activities in the new proposal.

The politically controversial question of the expansion of NATO depots in Denmark, which the Radical Liberal Party, among others, has already rejected, was not touched on yesterday. Defense Minister Poul Soegaard said after the meeting that the depot issue will have to be cleared up by the parties discussing the defense settlement before the government can make up its mind on a possible future U.S. offer of "earmarked" reinforcements for Denmark. However, the government is waiting for an offer to be made.

Palle Simonsen said that if the Radical Liberals adhere to their national congress rejection concerning depot expansions in Denmark, the party will have excluded itself from the defense negotiations.

The government's plan covers the period up to 1985, but the negotiations are still only intended to cover a 4-year settlement.

Radical Liberal Jens Bilgrav-Nielsen said after the meeting that he did not expect the negotiations to reach a satisfactory conclusion after the present round, but saw the government finally extending the present defense bill to the end of 1982. In this way problems with respect to economic policy for 1981 would be avoided with the Radical Liberal Party, and the government would gain time. The parties involved in the defense settlement will have to agree if new laws to raise defense revenue are to be implemented in 1981.

As an open admission of this, Poul Soegaard has also included in his proposal plans to introduce mobilization exercises via radio and television and to increase the number of the times men can be redrafted.

New negotiations are planned for 2 weeks' time.

AFTENPOSTEN: 'NONSOCIALIST' PARTIES MUST UNIFY EFFORTS

LD060931 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 2 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "The Political Struggle"]

[Text] The opening today of the 125th ordinary Storting marks the beginning of a year of political struggle, when the temperature will show a steadily rising curve right up to the "momentous election" on 14 September next year. Once again we are faced with the question of which course is to be the foundation for future developments in Norwegian society. The question is actually even more important now than in the past, since if the trend toward a socialist society is not halted now it could be too late. Many years of back-door socialization, an ever finer net of detailed regulations, of prohibitions and orders, has little by little had such thorough effects that a new period with a socialist majority in the Storting would make a reversal after a further 4 years impossible. At its national congress in the spring the Labor Party will repeat its program of objectives for continuing to reshape society on socialist patterns, with all that this entails for the individual's daily circumstances. In other words, the prospects arising out of socialist policies should be clear enough.

The political battle before the Storting election next year will not only be about economic policy, even though this is important enough--indeed, it is of the utmost importance both for the individual's and society's ability to realize their goals, but let us not forget that the battle is also about world view and opinions, about views of society, culture and humanity. Socialist policy on schools and education is one of many examples which show that there is a fundamental difference between the Labor Party on the one hand and the three largest nonsocialist parties, with their common values, on the other.

All this emphasizes how important it is that the Conservative, Christian People's and Center parties should be able to give proof of a credible, effective alternative before the 1981 Storting election. If this is to be possible, it will depend to a great extent on the willingness and ability of the nonsocialist parties to show a common front in the fall budget debate in the Storting. For this very reason we have said in the past how important it is for the biggest nonsocialist parties to be able to reach agreement on the main framework for economic policy when the financing proposal is shaped. Such a joint nonsocialist profile would make it easier for the individual parties to stress their differences. Joint support for the main outline--despite disagreement on many questions of detail--would make it clear to the electorate that there was a realistic government alternative.

If the opposite happens, that is, that the nonsocialist parties diverge on a number of important questions, it will hardly be possible for the Conservative, Christian People's and Center parties to appear to represent the credible alternative that the majority of voters want. They should make careful note of this now, as the Storting meets to begin its important work. We expect that disagreement on individual matters will take a back seat to the unity tasks with which developments are now facing the nonsocialist parties.

COMMENTARY ON OLOF PALME'S VISIT TO MOSCOW

LD031029 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 30 Sep 80 p 2

[Axel Waldemarson commentary: "Guests of the Central Committee"]

[Text] On Monday [29 September] Olof Palme traveled to Moscow at the head of a four-man delegation from the Social Democratic Party. According to available information it is the first time the Swedish Social Democrats have been invited to be the guests of the CPSU.

Normally exchanges take place between so-called fraternal parties, i.e. in this case social democrats visit each other and communists visit each other. The contacts that have taken place since World War II were of course at government level, when Tage Erlander met the Soviet leaders in Moscow and the latter were his guests in Sweden.

That possibility has not been available since the change of government in 1976. In practice the difference is not that great; it is Soviet state power represented by the only party in the state that the Swedish Social Democrats will meet. Nevertheless it is still an indication of something when the Social Democrats as a party accept an invitation from the Soviet Communists.

It must have been after much consideration that Olof Palme accepted the invitation. He was after all going to be the guest of a party whose policies he says he fights and whose treatment of dissidents he strongly condemns. Of course, there is also a risk that the visit will give further legitimacy to Lars Werner's Communists in some quarters.

At the same time it must have been difficult for Palme to refuse the invitation to visit Moscow. Among the topics for discussion are the international situation, peace and disarmament. It would of course seem odd if Olof Palme in the role of chairman of the commission that has adopted as its task to work for disarmament and peace, rather than in the role as chairman of his party, should not be able to discuss these topics with representatives of one of the superpowers.

But Olof Palme as leader of our largest party carries a responsibility to ensure that Swedish defenses should be able to be equal to the tasks that the state authorities impose on it. It is not always easy to play two roles at one and the same time. While Palme's interests in Moscow are more to do with global detente and disarmament it is possible that his hosts are more concerned with raising specifically Scandinavian security problems.

As NATO members Denmark and Norway have been the objects of more Soviet attention than is customary. Norway is just about to conclude negotiations on stockpiling certain types of heavy allied military materiel on Norwegian soil. In Denmark there is an intensive debate on the 3-percent increase in defense spending at which NATO is aiming.

The other day in New York Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen informed his Soviet counterpart, Andrey Gromyko, of his government's views on defense policy and told him that it does not intend to increase defense spending by 3 percent in real terms. This seems a little questionable, considering that the issue is far from decided and considering that the big parties in Denmark will have further negotiations on it.

When the delegation members from the Norwegian Labor Party were guests in Moscow, Norwegian policy on military bases was subjected to such strenuous criticism that the delegates became angry and let it be known that they might very well go home and get it changed: The Norweigans impose such restrictions on themselves as the fact that foreign troops may not be stationed on Norwegian soil and nuclear arms may not be stored on Norwegian soil, and there are further geographical limitations on military activity the nearer one gets to the border with the Soviet Union.

Nothing is so difficult as timing political deliberations so that they are not affected by the course of events in general. Undeniably it is something of a quirk of fate that the Social Democratic delegation's trip to Moscow to discuss detente and disarmament coincides with the enormous provocation that the intrusion of the impudent submarine of unknown nationality into Swedish territorial waters constitutes.

In any events the Social Democratic delegation is probably hoping that the drama will not be given a denouement which will complicate its stay in Moscow as the guests of the Communist Party Central Committee.

NC041528 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 4 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis has stated that all those he had contact with at the UN General Assembly in New York told him that they agreed with the line that Cyprus follows regarding the dialogue and the moderation and logic the Cyprus Government shows in handling the Cyprus issue in general. Mr Rolandhis also stated that all have deemed it necessary to avoid the creation of a bitter climate as long as the dialogue is being held in a constructive way. The minister added: During these critical moments, the international community expects responsibility, moderation and prudence from Cyprus as well as adherence and faith in the diaglogue's progress and in all that has been agreed upon until now. He stressed; if the dialogue fails because of disagreement, our friends will support us, perhaps more warmly than before. But if we destroy the dialogue with frivolous acts, then it is possible that we will pay a very dear price in international currency.

Mr Rolandhis, who returned to Cyprus early this morning, had two meetings with the UN Secretary General and separate meetings with the UN General Assembly President and 32 foreign ministers of various countries. He also met with the nonaligned contact group and the Commonwealth Secretary General.

NEWSPAPERS STRESS ISSUE OF U.S. FORCES AT UK BASES

TA NEA Report

NC040728 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 4 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The British bases in Cyprus are in a state of war readiness under the operational control of the Pentagon and in cooperation with NATO Headquarters in Brussels. This is in connection with the continuing war between Iran and Iraq and the general anomalous situation prevailing in the Middle East.

During the House of Representatives meeting the day before yesterday, EDEK Chairman Vasos Lissaridhis charged that U.S. military forces are stationed at the British bases. He pointed out the Cyprus Goverment's duty to demand control over the use of the bases. At the same time, Lissaridhis stressed the dangers to the island and pointed out that Britain is flagrantly violating the provisions it has pledged to observe within the framework of the agreements that were imposed on Cyprus.

According to established reports, Pentagon air and naval staffs have been posted at the British bases where they have been coordinating the unprecedented movement of men and war materiel to the area of conflict in the Arabian Gulf. At the same time, well-informed Western diplomatic circles have been persistently maintaining that war activities by the United States and NATO at the Western front--as it is described--of the Arabian Gulf have been planned and be directed from the British bases in Cyprus.

In the meantime, in full confirmation of and in addition to what EDEK Chairman Vasos Lissaridhis said in the House, TA NEA has received cross-checked reports from authoritative sources that serve to prove the stepping up of activities that have been taking place at the British bases all through the day and night. These reports say the following:

12 Phantom planes, 4 heavy Hercules transport aircraft--full of men and materiel, 3 transport planes used for refuelling other aircraft in the air and one nuclear "D" [as published] bomber landed at the Akrotiri-Episkopi bases within one hour (from 2305 to 0005) last Friday evening.

The U.S. Air Force insignia were clearly visible on these planes.

Irrespective of the TA NEA reports, which supplement the information submitted to the House of Representatives, the government spokesman yesterday declined to comment on the charges by EDEK Chairman Vasos Lissaridhis that the British bases have actually been ceded to the Pentagon. But, he referred to a past statement by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that confined itself to an assurance by a British diplomat that "nothing...is happening at the bases."

It is already known that, following Mr Lissaridhis' charges and his suggestion to the House that the Cyprus Government must make representations to Britain and must demand control over the bases, the House authorized its president to raise the issue with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

KHARAVYI Report

NC040837 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 4 Oct 80 pp 1,8

[Excerpts] The British bases in our country have actually become a mortal danger for Cyprus and the whole region. This is proved by the recently increased use of the bases by British-American imperialism.

In addition to what was stated in the House of Representatives the day before yesterday, authoritative reports say that apart from the Air Force units permanently stationed at Akrotiri, the following planes have arrived there:

12 modern U.S. Phantom fighter-bombers.
3 heavy Vulcan bombers.
2 giant Victor aircraft used for refuelling other planes in the air.

Large quantities of war materiel were also carried by huge Hercules transport aircraft through the bases. At the same time, new and more modern equipment has been supplied to the radar stations at Akrotiri, Troodos, and Ayia Napa, and to the huge espionage telecommunications center at Ayios Nikolaos, Famagusta. These installations are used to monitor all messages passing through the Middle East region; to give instructions to and to receive information from spies operating in the region; and to observe the movement of aircraft.

Finally, the flights of U.S. U-2 spy planes, which have been stationed at Akrotiri since 1968, have been increased. These planes from a very high altitude, spy on the movement of military forces and ships from the Soviet border to the Arabian Gulf. They also consititute a powerful intelligence weapon in the hands of the Pentagon.

It is obvious that all these activities are directly connected with the preparations of the NATO allies (headed by the United States) in the Arabian Gulf.

Political observers in Nicosia have pointed out that in view of this most serious threat, the government cannot continue its indifference. Beyond the fact that the U.S. presence at the bases flagrantly violates the treaty of establishment with Britain, this also further restricts the sovereignty and independence of the Cyprus Republic and its status of nonalignment in international affairs.

Cyprus' relations with friendly countries and revolutionary movements and, actually, the very future of the Cypriot people, are also in jeopardy. The political observers stressed that it is imperative that the government react decisively, both here and at the international arena, with the primary goal of maintaining respect for the treaty of establishment and with the ultimate goal of the abolition of the bases and the complete demilitarization of Cyprus. The Cypriot people and the peace-loving forces in the world will boldly support the removal of this threat from our island and from the disturbed region of the eastern Mediterranean.

RADIO REPORTS MUSKIE STATEMENT ON GREEK RETURN TO NATO

AT041408 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 4 Oct 80

[Text] In reply to a question by reporters on whether or not there has been any progress in connection with the issue of Greece's return to the NATO military wing, the U.S. Secretary of State has stated that negotiations continue but because he is not participating in them he can say nothing. "I did not want to be briefed on the details," Muskie said, "so that there would be no doubt that this is an issue of a military nature and not a political issue."

Meanwhile, during yesterday's press briefing in Washington, a representative of the U.S. State Department said that Muskie is very much interested in Greece's return to the NATO military wing and that he had discussed in detail the political aspects of the issue with Greek and Turkish officials.

PAPANDREOU SUPPORTS ALL EFFORTS TO COPE WITH NATO PRESSURE

AT022040 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 2 Oct 80

[Text] Majority opposition leader and PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou in a statement on talks for Greece's return to NATO, mentioned that PASOK wants to make it clear in all directions it will actively support every sincere effort to deal with NATO blackmail. Papandreou added PASOK will also contribute toward establishment of national unity of spirit for the purpose of dealing with any threat from the outside. He also reiterated PASOK's opposition to NATO and stressed that participation in NATO and the presence of U.S. and NATO bases in Greece oppose both our national independence and territorial integrity.

MESIMVRINI on Papandreou Stand

AT031443 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 3 Oct p 1

[Text] In the Rallis-Papandreou meeting that was agreed (at the prime minister's initiative) to take place on Monday, the former will brief the leader of the official opposition on how the government is dealing with the NATO and bases issues and on what developments have taken place as a result of contacts in Athens and New York:

It should be noted that by Monday the prime minister will have been fully briefed on the Turkish viewpoint on many issues since Mitsotakis and Turkmen will have met in New York on Sunday. Of course, as has been repeatedly stressed, Greece and Turkey will not discuss the issue of our country's return to the NATO military wing. However, it is believed that, during the discussion with his counterpart on other issues, the foreign minister will form an opinion on the more general positions of the Turkish generals concerning Greece.

It is also expected that during the meeting on Monday Papandreou, who with his statement yesterday stressed that he will contribute to the consolidation of national consensus (his statement and the government reply follow), will reiterate that a return to military NATO is not a solution but that a complete withdrawal from NATO and the removal of the bases is.

Meanwhile, since yesterday, two new elements have been added to the political atmosphere; the effort by Deputy Secretary of State Christopher to convince Minister of Coordination Boutos, who is in Washington, that Greece must make concessions in order to return to NATO; and West Germany's participation in the effort to convince Turkey of a more conciliatory stance on the issue of Greece's return to NATO and on the Cyprus issue. According to reports, the German intervention is taking place through "economic arguments."

People like Minister of Finance Matthoefer claim that following the Turkish coup the proportion of 7 to 10 for the supply of German military aid to Greece and Turkey should not be upset.

Papandreou's Statement

"It is obvious--the PASOK chairman stated--that Greece is being blackmailed by both Washington and Ankara to make concessions on national sovereign rights.

"PASOK wants to make it clear to all concerned that it will actively support any sincere effort to confront NATO extortions, and that it will contribute to the consolidation of a national consensus in order to confront any threat from abroad.

"Of course, not only do we have the right but we also have the duty to remind the government that from the day of its establishment PASOK has declared that the Atlantic Alliance can only burden our fatherland with evils. For this reason, PASOK's firm positions include the final and irrevocable withdrawal from NATO and the removal of the U.S. and NATO bases from our country.

"It is disappointing that, in being trapped by the policy of 'we belong to the West,' the government of new democracy continues to negotiate for return to the alliance's military wing in return for the signing of a bilateral agreement between Greece and the United States on the bases. As soon as possible the government must finally understand that both participation in the Atlantic Alliance and the continuing presence of the U.S. and NATO bases in Greece run contrary to our national independence and territorial integrity."

Government Reply

In reply, the government spokesman stated:

"It is agreeable that PASOK also recognizes the need for a national consensus in confronting any threat from abroad. However, it is sad that the PASOK chairman does not understand that the country's interest dictates our return to the NATO military wing, of course, under the necessary prerequisite that there will be concessions either with regard to our national sovereignty or our territorial integrity. This is the government policy which neither blackmails nor is subject to blackmail."

FRANCE, FRG IMPOSE VISA REQUIREMENT ON TURKISH CITIZENS

TA050738 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Text] Beginning today, Turkish citizens will be required to have a visa for France and the FRG. Turkish citizens with official passports will be exempt from this requirement. Turkish citizens with residence and work permits in the FRG will not need a visa on their return when they leave the country temporarily. On the other hand, Turkish citizens with residence and work permits in France will still have to complete certain formalities, even if they leave the country on a temporary basis, though no visa will be needed on their return.

Turkish businessmen, artists, scientists and sportsmen will be granted visas immediately to France and the FRG if they can produce the necessary documents showing the reason for visiting these countries.

Reactions to Visa Imposition

NC041042 [Editorial report] On 1 October 1980 CUMHURIYET, on pages 1 and 5, carried an unattributed commentary "Being Ousted From Europe" in which the commentator refers to the aims and aspirations of the Council of Europe, as laid down in the first article of the Council's statutes, and adds: "The passports of the citizens of the Turkish Republic carry the stamp of the Council of Europe. Nevertheless, the Federal Republic of Germany has imposed visa requirements on Turks as of today; France has acted likewise. According to press reports, Holland is also engaged in similar preparations. It is thus feared that other European countries will follow suit. To put it briefly, these are measures that will eventually lead to the ousting of our countrymen from Europe."

After referring to the circumstances which force Turkish citizens to flock to Western countries for employment, the commentator concludes: "Unfortunately, our membership, for which we signed the Council of Europe agreement in 1949, faces the danger of remaining on paper. Turkey must take urgent measures and implement them without delay if it does not wish to be reduced to the position of a country that is being gradually ousted from Europe and treated with contempt."

On 1 October 1980 on page 5, GUNAYDIN carried a short statement by former National Defense Minister Hasan Esat Isik on the question of visa requirements imposed by European countries on Turks. Isik deplores the action taken by West Germany and France, which he describes as restricting the formation of free relations advocated by the Council of Europe and adds: "If such measures continue to be taken against Turkey, Turkey cannot go on refraining indefinitely from taking countermeasures.

"Freedom of passage in international relations is generally recognized as a mutual facility. For Turkey, dignity is not any less important than profits from tourism."

The same paper on the same page carried the views of Professor Sait Yuksel. Among other things, Professor Yuksel says: "It must be clearly brought home to our Western friends that with its soldiers, workers and people the Turkish nation is an indivisible whole. Attaching importance only to its soldiers and treating its workers and people as second class citizens--the kind of treatment that is meted out to no other people in Europe--cannot be tolerated. Turkey cannot approve of such an attitude in its foreign policy."

Professor Yuksel finally suggests that "if no other effective countermeasure can be taken at this stage, Turkey must impose visa requirements on all countries which impose visa requirements on Turkish citizens."

The same paper on the same page examines the legal aspects of the decision of Germany and France to impose visa requirements on Turks, and maintains that this decision is contrary to the NATO alliance. The paper quotes both the Turkish and English versions of Article 2 of the alliance which runs as follows: "The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

The article concludes: "Germany and France are two countries which do not hesitate to pat us on the back and say 'Turkey is the staunchest country of the southeast flank of NATO. It is the indestructible fortress of the West.' But they say this only when their interests are involved. When their interests are even slightly touched they do not refrain from pushing aside NATO principles and adopting the most unbearable decisions against Turkish citizens."

On 1 October, pages 2 and 10, MILLIYET carries an article by Mumtaz Soysal "The Visa of Europe." Soysal explains the reasons why European countries have decided to impose visa requirements on Turks and, after suggesting various countermeasures, says: "As a state we must complain to the European Human Rights Commission about those who have imposed visa requirements on Turks. Their action has nothing to do with 'public order, public health or public security.' It is directly linked with the situation in the labor market, which could be rectified through economic measures. But instead, they have chosen to discriminate against 'certain nationalities' and to subject them to humiliation.

"We could go further and hit them where it hurts most.... Imposing restrictions and obstructions on the investments and enterprises in Turkey of those who have chosen to impose visa requirement on Turkish citizens, and differentiating between those who have and those who have not imposed these requirements--with respect to granting them communication and passage facilities--will soon bring them down on their knees. Even if Turkey considers itself "dependent" on foreign investments and aid, it is not so 'helpless' as not to be able to benefit from the attitude of the countries which are trying to crush one another in the fields of foreign investments and foreign trade.

"Like human beings, states too are only helpless so long as they think they are."
